Extract from the minutes of the Ohio Society of New York, January 11, 1904:

“WHEREAS, It is deemed highly desirable to have prepared a correct chronological history of the Society from its inception and organization; therefore, be it

“Resolved, That the governing committee be, and it hereby is, authorized and requested to cause such a history to be prepared, and to employ such assistance in the work, at such compensation as to it may seem proper, and also to appoint a special committee of five members to supervise and approve the work.”

The governing committee reported to the Society on February 8th, 1904, that the following gentlemen had been selected pursuant to this resolution:

GEN. HENRY L. BURNETT,

HON. WARREN HIGLEY,

MR. LEANDER H. CRALL,

HON. MILTON I. SOUTHARD,*

MR. ANDREW J. C. FOYE.*

* Deceased.

P R E F A C E

THIS record of the Ohio Society of New York has been prepared under the direction of the special committee appointed for that purpose. The author desires to acknowledge the courtesy, the willing assistance, and the devoted interest which these gentlemen have shown, not only in advice as to plan and scope, but in the aid which they have extended in the gathering of material, and in counsel from time to time.

The story told in these pages is, and purports to be, nothing more nor less than that called for in the resolution under which the work was authorized—a plain chronological history of the Ohio Society of New York. The minute books of the Society and of the governing committee have furnished the main body of information. These have been supplemented by the reports of officers and committees, by the official programmes prepared upon special, social or other occasions, the year books, scrap-books, kept by the superintendent of the Society rooms, by newspaper files, and, in a few instances, the personal recollections of early members.

While it is to be regretted that in many cases good material has been lost by the meagreness of official record, it cannot fail to be a gratification to the members that so much of value and interest has been preserved; far more than was thought possible by any when it was proposed that the story of the Society should be preserved in concrete form. This holds especially true of the banquets which have achieved national fame. Many have been the expressions of regret that the Society had not earlier inaugurated its present commendable system of reporting in full and preserving the speeches made by eminent men upon these occasions. It is with pleasure your historian states that practically all of these speeches are reproduced with more or less fulness; many of them verbatim. It was not without research and labor that the valuable material was secured, but a perusal of the pages that follow will show that it has not been lost. Many of the most eminent among American citizens have spoken upon these occasions; presidents, vice-presidents, cabinet officers, senators, governors, diplomats, soldiers, naval officers, and others. In the twenty years which have passed since the Ohio Society was organized, there has been hardly a man great in national affairs who has not been present as orator or guest on one or more of these occasions. The speakers have dwelt eloquently upon great themes. It can hardly be questioned that there is no one book published in America that can show so much that is truly great and varied in the way of public speeches as this History of the Ohio Society of New York.

The official transactions of the Society, and its social relaxations, have been recorded in the order of their occurrence, with such fulness as available records would permit. The historian has confined himself to the record, without criticism, comparison or comment. There has been no attempt to depart from a plain statement of the facts as they have occurred; no endeavor to point a moral or adorn a tale. There will, no doubt, be errors of fact discovered; there will be omissions pointed out; there will be suggestions that undue mention has been made of this thing or not enough of that. These are acknowledged in advance. They were necessary features in connection with a work in which so many have a loving, personal interest; in which so much of detail appears. The historian has done what he could with the disconnected and widely scattered material at his hand.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

CHAPTER I

1885-1886

THE foundation principles upon which the Ohio Society of New York was built were set forth in a few eloquent words by its first president, Thomas Ewing, on the night when the labors of its founders had reached a point where the work of organization was to be completed.

"We found this Society," said he, "because we love Ohio, and would cherish her history, her traditions, her recollections of home, and camp, and forum."

It was in the spirit of loyal love for Ohio and of fraternity among its sons that breathes in these words, that a few Ohioans in New York City came together in the closing days of 1885 for the purpose of forming an organization that should bring the sons of their native state into closer personal relations and keep alive the memories of home in this city of their adoption.

The justification that comes through triumphant success has been theirs. The story that follows shows not only how wisely were the foundations laid, but also with what unswerving love and patriotic devotion these men and their later associates and successors labored to make this great organization not only the first, but the foremost of its kind.

It detracts from the credit due to no other Ohioan in New York, and voices only the sentiments of his working associates, to say that Col. Charles W. Moulton was especially enthusiastic and insistent as to what might be done, and for some little time made it a labor of love, to call upon Ohioans in New York with a view to enlisting them in the formation of a Buckeye organization.

Suggestions and sentiment seem to have soon crystallized into a definite plan, and, as the first starting-place of this record of the Ohio Society of New York, we turn to the first entry in its first minute book, under date of November 10th, 1885, where is found the following:

"The Ohio Society of New York. We, the undersigned, hereby agree to unite with each other to form an association to be known as The Ohio Association in New York, and to that end will meet at any place designated for the purpose of completing such organization, upon notice given to us whenever twelve persons shall have signed this agreement. There is to be no expense incurred until the organization is completed and assented to by each member."

Following this entry are the names set down below, which are given in the order in which they appear upon the record: C. W. Moulton, Joseph Pool, T. Ewing, Samuel Thomas, Homer Lee, Wm. Perry Fogg, Milton Sayler, Mahlon Chance, L. M. Schwan, J. O. Moss, M. I. Southard, Anson G. McCook, W. C. Andrews, W. M. Safford, Calvin S. Brice, J. W. Harman, J. Q. Howard, David F. Harbaugh, H. J. Jewett, Warren Higley, Cyrus Butler, Carson Lake.

There hangs upon the walls of the Ohio Society rooms in the Waldorf-Astoria—placed there in obedience to a formal vote of a later date—a framed call reproducing the words above quoted. To this are attached, in the original autographs, the names and addresses given below; reproduced as nearly in facsimile as the types will permit:

Thomas Ewing

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

In accordance with the above, a notice was sent to the subscribers to meet at the law office of Ewing & Southard, No. 155 Broadway, on the 13th of November, 1885, at 3:30 P. M. A majority of the signers were present. General Thomas Ewing was elected president pro tem. David F. Harbaugh was elected secretary pro tem. The president appointed the following members as a committee on permanent organization: C. W. Moulton, Wm. Perry Fogg, Cyrus Butler, J. Q. Howard, Mahlon Chance, M. I. Southard, David F. Harbaugh, Warren Higley, Calvin S. Brice and Joseph Pool.*

The official record mentions no business done at this session, except to adjourn to the same place at 2:30 P. M. of November 20th, and to instruct the secretary to notify each of the subscribers of said meeting.

The second meeting was held upon the date above named. So much was accomplished in this session toward setting up and starting the machinery of the Society, that the official report of the gathering is given in full as follows:

“New York, November 20, 1885.

“Pursuant to adjournment, the meeting of the Society was called to order by president pro tem General Thomas Ewing, and the minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved. The chairman then announced that the first business in order was to hear the report of the committee on organization appointed at the last meeting.

“Col. Wm. Perry Fogg, on behalf of the committee, submitted a report of a constitution of the Society. Upon motion the report was read, section by section. Each section was discussed by the various members, and a separate vote on each section was taken. Col. C. W. Moulton then moved that this report on the constitution be unanimously accepted and adopted, and that copies of the same be engrossed and printed for the use of members. Motion seconded, carried. The following is the report so adopted:

“To the officers and members of the Ohio Society in New York. Gentlemen: The committee on permanent organization, who were instructed to frame an outline of a constitution and by-laws for the government of this Society, beg leave to submit the following report:

“CONSTITUTION.

“ARTICLE 1.—The name of this association shall be ‘The Ohio Society of New York.’

“ARTICLE 2.—Its object shall be to cultivate social intercourse and promote the best interests of its members.

*The facts concerning the above meeting are entered in the first record book of the recording secretary, attested by David F. Harbaugh, secretary pro tem. Where the proceedings of the Society are quoted hereafter, they will be from the books of the secretary or of the governing committee, unless otherwise specified.

“ OFFICERS.

“ ARTICLE 3.—The officers shall be chosen from the active members and shall be: 1, a president; 2, three vice-presidents; 3, a secretary and assistant secretary; 4, a treasurer; 5, a governing committee of nine members; all of whom shall be elected at the regular annual meeting of the Society, and shall discharge the duties incident to their respective offices under the general direction of the Society.

“ MEMBERSHIP.

“ ARTICLE 4.—There shall be three classes of membership: 1, Active members; 2, Non-resident members; 3, Honorary members.

“ ARTICLE 5.—Any person of good moral character and twenty-one years of age and upwards may become an active member of this Society upon payment of the prescribed dues, who is a native of the state of Ohio or has for a period of seven consecutive years been a resident of that state, and who has a good social and business standing in New York.

“ ARTICLE 6.—Any person of like age and character, and residing in the state of Ohio may become a non-resident member (if approved by a majority of the governing committee) upon payment of the prescribed dues.

“ ARTICLE 7.—Honorary membership may be conferred by a unanimous vote of the governing committee upon persons deserving that distinction, provided, however, that not more than five such memberships shall be conferred during one year.

“ ARTICLE 8.—Non-resident and honorary members shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Society, except those of voting and of becoming officers of said Society.

“ ARTICLE 9.—The governing committee has power by a majority vote to admit active new members; but the names so admitted to membership shall be reported to the Society by said committee at its next monthly meeting.

“ ARTICLE 10.—The first meeting of this Society for the selection of officers shall be held within ten days after at least one hundred persons shall have signed the constitution, and at the regular annual meetings thereafter.

“ MEETINGS.

“ ARTICLE 11.—The annual meetings of the Society shall be held on the 29th day of November in each year. Monthly meetings shall be held on the first Monday of every month, at such hour as the governing committee may determine.

“ARTICLE 12.—The initiation fee of active and non-resident members shall be ten dollars until at least one hundred persons have become members, and until the first meeting is held for the election of officers. Thereafter the initiation fee may be fixed at any sum by resolution of the Society that it may deem proper.

“ARTICLE 13.—This constitution and the by-laws that may hereafter be adopted may be altered or amended by a two-thirds vote of those present at any meeting called for that purpose, of which due notice has been given to the members.

“C. W. MOULTON,
“WM. PERRY FOGG,
“J. Q. HOWARD, “CYRUS BUTLER,
“DAVID F. HARBAUGH,
“M. I. SOUTHARD,
“JOSEPH POOL,
“MAHLON CHANCE.”

“Col. W. W. Moulton moved that the following resolution be adopted: ‘That the committee on permanent organization be directed to report to the president pro tem. of the Society whenever one hundred names shall have been enrolled, and as soon as this is done, the president shall call a meeting of the Society, and the secretary shall give due notice thereof two days before the meeting to every member to be present, at such time and place as shall be designated for said meeting by the president.’ Motion seconded, carried.

“Col. William Perry Fogg moved that the following resolution be adopted: ‘That the committee on permanent organization be authorized to enroll new members, and have leave to report at any time until the election of permanent officers.’ Motion seconded, carried.

“Col. Fogg moved that: ‘The committee on organization be authorized and requested to report for consideration suitable names for the officers (permanent) of this Society, at the meeting to be called for the selection of officers.’ Motion seconded, carried.

“It was then moved that the following names be added to the committee on permanent organization: Carson Lake, Cyrus Butler, Joseph Pool, John W. Harman, Charles H. Blair, Homer Lee. Motion seconded, carried.

“DAVID F. HARBAUGH, Sec. pro tem.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

A gentleman who was present at these early conferences has furnished his testimony as to the spirit of these gatherings. Charles H. Blair says: "Committees upon constitution and by-laws were appointed and a very warm discussion arose, as I recall, between Cyrus Butler and Colonel Moulton, regarding the objects and aims of the Society. It was proposed to make it into a regular club with a restaurant and all the accompaniments of a city club. This was warmly opposed by some of the members, myself among others, on the theory that many of us were already members of clubs in New York city, and that it was not desirable to so disassociate ourselves from our fellow citizens of New York as to form ourselves into an ordinary social club. The club idea never prevailed."

On the 13th of January, 1886, a meeting was held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, at which a number of important measures received consideration. Gen. Thomas Ewing occupied the chair. The minutes of the preceding meeting were read by Mr. Harbaugh, and approved.

Col. Moulton, on behalf of his special committee, recommended that the constitution be so amended as to provide for five vice-presidents instead of three. The president held that, being in the nature of an amendment to the constitution, it would require a two-thirds vote to adopt it. The vote was called for, and the change was ordered unanimously. On motion of Mr. Southard the constitution as amended was adopted as a whole. The election of officers was then called for, and Gen. Ewing was unanimously elected president for the ensuing year. We quote from the official record:

"On motion of Mr. Follett, which was duly seconded, Col. Moulton was authorized to cast the vote of the Society for the five vice-presidents, and there being no dissenting vote, this was agreed to. The names of the five members recommended by the committee were put in nomination to serve one year: Whitelaw Reid, William L. Strong, Wager Swayne, Hugh J. Jewett, Algernon S. Sullivan, thus endorsing the recommendation of the committee.

"The nomination for secretary for the ensuing year was then considered, and Homer Lee was duly elected. The recording secretary and treasurer were then acted upon. Carson Lake and William Perry Fogg, respectively, were unanimously elected. The president, on motion of Cyrus Butler, then named a committee of five to nominate a governing committee of nine members, as follows: Cyrus Butler, William Perry Fogg, Washington Belt, Wallace Mayo, Milton I. Southard. This committee retired to prepare a list for presentation to the Society. During the interval, Gen. Henry L. Burnett was called upon and responded, after which Algernon S. Sullivan, Gen. Wager Swayne, Bernard Peters, Col. William L. Strong and Col. Moulton made appropriate remarks.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“The nominating committee at this point reported that a list of names for the governing committee had been decided upon, and presented the following for consideration, which was unanimously elected, alphabetically: Henry L. Burnett, Calvin S. Brice, Stephen B. Elkins, A. J. C. Foyé, Jerome D. Gillett, A. D. Juilliard, C. W. Moulton, Joseph Pool. The motion to appoint a committee of seven, by the chair, on art, history and literature was made, seconded, debated and carried. Thereupon the president stated that he would announce the names of the said committee at the next meeting in February. C. W. Moulton notified the members present that he would move an amendment to the constitution increasing the governing committee from nine to twelve, at the next monthly meeting. On motion of H. A. Glassford, it was resolved that the adoption and consideration of by-laws for the Society be referred to the governing committee for action. Considerable discussion on the subject having arisen, the motion was modified, and the subject of by-laws was referred to the president and the five vice-presidents, as a special committee, to frame and report a suitable code of by-laws for the government of the Society. A letter was read from Joseph Pool, a member of the committee on permanent organization, stating illness as the cause of his absence, and one from W. S. Hawk, of the Windsor Hotel, kindly tendering to the Society the use of a parlor. The meeting adjourned, after a vote of thanks to the proprietor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel for courtesy extended.

“HOMER LEE, Secretary.”

The above official report gives but the cold, bare outlines of this, one of the most fruitful and interesting of the early meetings of the Society. Fortunately, the remarks made by President Thomas Ewing, on calling the meeting together, have been preserved among the family papers, and are here given in full:

“We have met here to-night, as sons and foster-sons of Ohio resident in New York city, to complete the foundation of a new society in our national metropolis. Full as this city is of organizations of men, she has, I think, none such as this. The ties of religion, charity, politics, science, art, literature and common occupation draw and hold people together in numberless associations which have filled our great city with splendid edifices. So, too, the sympathies of a common race and history have founded here societies of St. Patrick, St. Andrew, St. George and many others, at whose annual reunions the wit, song and sentiment of the fatherlands warm the hearts of their sons in this land beyond the sea. And here, also, is an American society which has at several crises in the last fifty years exerted a considerable influence on public opinion; and the annual reunions of which are watched with eagerness everywhere throughout our land where the sons of New England from their distant homes look proudly and fondly back on their grand old mother.

“But the New England society is composed of the sons of six states. This is a society of the natives or former residents of but a single state—Ohio—the state first born of the American republic. I do not say she was the first state received into the union, for Vermont, Kentucky and Tennessee preceded her. Vermont was admitted in 1791, Kentucky in '92, Tennessee in '96, and Ohio not until the 29th day of November, 1802. But these three older states were never territories of the union. They begun life as colonies, each exclusively owned by and settled from its parent colony—Vermont from New York, Kentucky from Virginia, and Tennessee from North Carolina. But the territory northwest of the Ohio River was the first land ever owned by the United States. It was a vast and pathless wilderness when, in 1784, Virginia, with magnificent generosity, presented it to the Union. It was not until ten years later, when the savages who had been allies of Great Britain throughout the War of the Revolution were routed and subdued by Mad Anthony Wayne, that agricultural settlements, except under the shadow of blockhouses, first became possible. Then the veteran soldiers of the Revolution, broken in fortune but aflame with the love of liberty, and triumphant from the long struggle for independence, flocked there from every one of the glorious thirteen—hewed out their homes in the primeval forest—paid the United States for their lands in the long dishonored certificates of indebtedness given for their service in the war, and thus founded the first state which sprung from the womb of the republic.

“We are proud of Ohio, for her heroic birth, her honorable achievements, and her glorious destiny. She ‘sits in the centre,’ belongs to no section, and is a bond of all.

“Her sons who have met here to-night are at home in New York. We do not come together as strangers in a strange land to seek relief from the depression of inhospitable influences. No! New York is not inhospitable. She is merely too big and too busy to note who comes or goes. Her gates, landward and seaward, are thrown open to the world. She is a focus of all the great forces of American life. Much that is best and worst in it is developed here; and the struggle for a foothold here is always intense and generally unsuccessful. But New York is more truly cosmopolitan than any other city in the United States, or perhaps in the world, and there is little of race or sectional prejudice to bar the path of merit, from whatever quarter it may come.

“We found this Society because we love Ohio and would cherish her history, her traditions, her recollections of home and camp and forum. How often do we not look back to the days and scenes of our life there to revive the sweetest influences and the dearest memories of existence. But we have aims for our Society besides the memories and affections of other days. We hope to make it felt in this great theatre of thought and action as a generator of wholesome, intellectual and moral forces.

“When this meeting was called there were one hundred and fifteen signers of our constitution. Under the direction of a judicious governing committee the number will doubtless be increased by several hundred. Our membership of non-residents will, perhaps, be equally large. We should make something more of such good and abundant material than a mere social club. I am far from insensible to the pleasures of convivial reunions, and hope our Society may have many of them, and that I may long be of the number present. But we can have some good work out of it as well as plenty of recreation. For instance, with the aid of our western and southwestern brethren who, like ourselves, have drifted into this corner of the republic, we might help it to throw off its colonial subserviency to English politics and manners and gradually Americanize it. We can thus repay in kind the debt of gratitude we owe the East for its missionary efforts a generation ago, when it was the seat of power in the United States and the now imperial West was but a half-subdued wilderness.

“Ere long, we can command means, I hope, to fit up and maintain an accessible, commodious and permanent clubhouse, the halls of which will be a pleasant rendezvous for members and their friends, where the ideas and policies of East and West may meet in friendly and intelligent encounter, and where sectional prejudices may be worn off in the attrition of social intercourse—where Ohio men and women who are eminent, or rising in any worthy field of effort, may have cordial recognition and a helping hand if needed; and where those who have unfortunately fallen in the struggle for a foothold here will not be forgotten. In conclusion, gentlemen, I venture to express the hope that our Society may be from the outset and continue to the end so aristocratic that wealth cannot buy a membership for vice; and so democratic that none will be excluded by needless cost of membership from an association which their virtues and talents would adorn.”

There is contemporary testimony from a prominent Ohio newspaper of that date* that the meeting was “one of the happiest gatherings ever held in Gotham. Nearly one hundred were present, including General Thomas Ewing, who presided; General Wager Swayne, Algernon S. Sullivan, Colonel W. L. Brown, J. Q. A. Ward, Colonel W. L. Strong, General H. L. Burnett, Henry E. Abbey, Rev. Dr. I. K. Funk, S. B. Elkins, B. Peters, and other well-known gentlemen. General Ewing created much enthusiasm by his address on the opening of the meeting.”

* Cincinnati Enquirer, of January 14, 1886.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The governing committee, always an important and responsible body in the record of the Society, immediately set itself in motion to put the affairs of the organization in running order. Its first meeting was held at the office of Gen. H. L. Burnett, No. 67 Wall street, at three o'clock, on Saturday, January 16th. There were present Messrs. H. L. Burnett, Thomas Ewing, A. J. C. Foyé, Wm. Perry Fogg, George Follett, J. D. Gillett, Carson Lake, Homer Lee, C. W. Moulton, Joseph Pool and Whitelaw Reid. The meeting was called to order by General Burnett, who nominated General Ewing for temporary chairman. Mr. Lake was made temporary secretary. The permanent organization of the committee being declared the order of business, Mr. Fogg nominated Colonel Moulton for chairman. Colonel Moulton, after a brief statement of his reasons, respectfully declined to permit the use of his name for that position. Mr. Gillett moved that General Burnett be selected as chairman, and the motion prevailed unanimously. Mr. Lee moved that Mr. Lake be elected secretary of the committee, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. Moulton moved that it be the standing rule of the governing committee that the chairman should appoint, as the chairman of any committee hereafter to be appointed, any member he might see fit, and that the usual parliamentary rule which makes it incumbent on a chairman to make the proposer of the motion for the selection of a committee the chairman of such committee, be abrogated. Carried. On motion, duly carried, the chair appointed Messrs. Moulton, Elkins and Lee as a committee to prepare forms of papers necessary for the admission of members. Mr. Moulton moved that a committee of three be appointed on by-laws, and assist in the preparation of the same, if desirable, and also to prepare and submit amendments to the constitution which might be deemed advisable. The motion was carried, and the chair appointed Messrs. Burnett, Pool and Fogg. On motion, Mr. Reid was also added to the committee.

Mr. Fogg, as treasurer of the Society, stated that there were now one hundred members enrolled, of whom fifty-one had enclosed the initiation fee of ten dollars. The receipts from membership in his hands were $510, and the disbursements had been $49.49, leaving a balance on hand of $460.51. The following resolution was offered by him and passed:

“RESOLVED, That the treasurer be requested to collect the initiation fee from those gentlemen who have signed the constitution and been enrolled as members.”

The chairman was instructed to confer with members of the committee and report at the next meeting on the matter of permanent headquarters.

Until a permanent abiding place could be secured, the Society was the guest of various hotels, several of which were under the control of Ohio men, all of whom were glad to make the associated Buckeyes welcome.

The next meeting was held at the Windsor Hotel, on February 1st, 1886, with President Ewing in the chair. He reported in behalf of the special committee, consisting of himself and the five vice-presidents, on the subject of by-laws. A number of amendments to the constitution were proposed, and then it and the by-laws were adopted, and both were ordered printed.

Col. W. L. Strong proposed General William T. Sherman as the first honorary member, and it was carried unanimously. A blank form of application for membership was read and adopted, and ordered printed and distributed among the members.

At the second meeting of the governing committee, held on February 12th, the matter of selecting a permanent home was taken up and discussed, but no formal action was taken. The list of those who had been proposed for membership was taken up for consideration. Colonel Moulton moved that where names were approved the persons should be declared elected to membership, subject to their compliance with the requirements of the constitution and by-laws, and that the secretary of the committee be instructed to notify the gentlemen of their election. Carried. The following names were approved, and are given in full, as being the first list officially acted upon by the committee: James C. Beard, T. Frank Beard, D. C. Beard, A. W. Beasley, D. T. Lawson, James Parker, E. B. Convers, J. B. Leavitt, J. S. Newberry, W. H. Quinn, Jacob N. Bonnett, N. W. Emerson, C. P. Cassiday, J. W. Worthington, Wallace Shillito, F. T. McFadden, Wm. S. Munson, R. G. Hanford, Lycurgus B. Moore, B. F. Peixotto, Gaylord McFall, H. H. Brockway, Richard Butler, E. J. Wheeler, Dr. N. H. Beckwith, Frederick J. Prentiss, Frederick C. Prentiss, Frank Brainard, Walter H. Brainard, Andrew Donaldson, Wm. C. Peet, H. B. Brundrett.

It was by vote ordered that all persons within a radius of fifty miles of the city hall of New York be considered eligible for active or resident membership. It was also ordered that the annual dues be made payable on the first of April each year. On February 26th a resolution was adopted directing the governing committee to take a lease of rooms at No. 236 Fifth avenue.

The meeting of the Society of February 26th, 1886, was held at the Gilsey House, and was called to consider the question of quarters. General Burnett, as chairman of the governing committee, made a report as to the action of that body, and gave details as to various places that might be secured, with locations, rentals, and other particulars.

The question was discussed in all its bearings by Messrs. Burnett, Butler, Foyé, Harman, Brown, Kimball, Fogg, Lee, Pool, etc. Mr. Lake moved that the governing committee, through its chairman, and the president and secretary of the Society, be empowered to lease rooms at No. 236 Fifth avenue for a term of one year. Mr. Kimball's amendment that the location be left to the judgment and selection of the governing committee was accepted by Mr. Lake, and the motion was then carried.

A design for the seal of the Society was presented by Secretary Homer Lee; was inspected, endorsed and adopted with thanks.

The meeting of March 8th was held at the Grand Central Hotel, at which the president announced a committee on literature, history and art as follows, in alphabetical order: C. H. Applegate, Cyrus Butler, J. H. Beard, J. Q. Howard, Andrew J. Rickoff, William Henry Smith, J. Q. A. Ward. The committee on entertainment was announced as follows: W. C. Andrews, William L. Brown, R. C. Kimball, Bernard Peters, William L. Strong. On motion of Mr. Pool the names of the president, secretary and chairman of the governing committee were added to the entertainment committee.

President Ewing suggested that between the present and the next meeting the members look up the date of admission of the state of Ohio to the Union, "which seemed to be in dispute." It was ordered that "the date of Ohio's admission be made the subject of discussion at the next meeting."*

William Perry Fogg moved that the entertainment committee be instructed to arrange a subscription dinner within a few weeks, at a cost not to exceed $5.00 a plate, and the motion was carried.

At the meeting of the governing committee held on March 16th, 1886, General Philip H. Sheridan and ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes were unanimously elected honorary members. On April 5th the committee appointed a sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Moulton, Lake, Lee, Fogg and Harbaugh, to present in brief form a history of the formation of the Society.

The meeting of the Society on April 6th was held at the Murray Hill Hotel. The name of C. W. Moulton was added to the entertainment committee. Letters were read from Senator John Sherman, Senator Henry B. Payne, Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite and Justice Stanley Matthews.

Mr. Howard, as chairman of the committee on history, literature and art, opened the discussion of the evening on "The date of Ohio's admission to the Union" by proposing the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the Ohio Society of New York, February 19, 1803, must be accepted as the date of the admission of the state of Ohio into the Union."

Mr. Howard read a paper citing various authorities in support of the

* It will be noted that even at this early date the Ohioans in New York began the discussion of this never-ending and never-settled question. It has been brought to the front many times since, and one of the pioneer members, Mahlon Chance, made it a close study for years, and collected much valuable material and data on the subject.

resolution. The matter was discussed by Messrs. Moulton, Burnett, Mitchell, Strong, Chance, Ashley, Ewing and Peters. The resolution was referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. Ewing, Burnett, Moulton, Howard, Ashley, Mitchell, Lake and Strong. The president stated that, as the beginning of a library for the Society, Mr. Stout had presented a history of Wayne County, Ohio. A vote of thanks was tendered. General Burnett moved that the president be requested to prepare a sketch of Thomas Corwin and present it at the next regular meeting. Motion was carried.

THE "subscription dinner," proposed by Colonel Fogg at the meeting of March 8th, was held at Delmonico's on the evening of May 7, 1886, and passed into the Society's history under the descriptive title of the "First Annual Banquet of the Ohio Society of New York." "Two hundred citizens whose hearts throbbed like one," to quote from a newspaper account of the affair, "cheered and applauded the sentiments that told how great and glorious were the good people within its limits. The Society was organized only last January, and is made up of men who have left the elysium of Ohio for the flesh-pots of New York. Members must be either natives of the Buckeye state or the descendants of natives. That tells its own story, and any attempt to say how really glorious last night's gathering was would sound stale and flat in comparison."

Five tables ran the length of the dining-hall, with General Thomas Ewing, president of the Society, at the centre table, flanked by Senator H. B. Payne on his left and Senator John Sherman on his right. Wager Swayne presided over one table, with Bernard Peters at the foot; Whitelaw Reid over a second table, with W. L. Brown facing him; A. S. Sullivan and W. C. Andrews had a third table, and W. L. Strong and H. L. Burnett a fourth.

As the official diagram prepared for this initial occasion tells the story of the banquet so far as relates to those who participated therein, it is reproduced in full.

The eloquent writer quoted above throws a further light upon the occasion in these appreciative words:

"Never since the morning stars sang together has there been such brotherly harmony as prevailed last night. One common enthusiasm kept the two hundred throats cheering all the evening. Every man felt convinced that without Ohio this country would be a land of darkness, and he wasn't afraid to say so, either. And every other man, when he wasn't busy saying this himself, put in his spare moments cheering the sentiments in the mouths of others. The American flag that tapestried the Union smiled only on Ohio men, and the very menu lacked something of its French flavor out of deference

Among those present were Senator John Sherman, Senator H. B. Payne, Joseph E. McDonald, ex-Governor R. M. Bishop, Hon. Charles Foster, James M. Ashley, William Henry Smith, Thomas T. Eckert, W. H. The following cablegram was received from the Hon. S. S. Cox: "General Thomas Ewing, 155 Broadway, New York. Ohio full of civil and martial honors. Her sons are peers without the heraldry; her daughters Peris without the harem. Fill the Golden Horn."

Homer Lee, the secretary, read letters of regret from Governor Hoadly, General Durbin Ward, Murat Halstead, Judge Thurman, Chief Justice Waite, Judge Cartter, General Schenck, Senator J. P. Jones, W. D. Howells, Richard Smith, General Sherman, General Sheridan and others. General Thomas Ewing then arose and said:

"I hail and congratulate you, guests and members of the Ohio Society of New York, on our delightful and auspicious reunion. It is good that we are here. This large assemblage of Ohio's sons, coming from far and near, attests how strong and vital are the ties which bind us to our mother state. We have every reason to love and to be proud of her. Gentlemen, we have not formed our society from a desire to cultivate state pride in any spirit of divided allegiance. No, no! There has been far too much of that in the past and cannot be too little in the future.

“We are first Americans, then Buckeyes. The blessings and misfortunes of our sister states are ours as well as theirs. The love of our own state and pride in her history spring largely from the fact that she and her institutions in their birth and growth are purely American. She is the oldest and, so far, the best developed of all the typically American states. Neither Roundhead nor Cavalier stood sponsor at her cradle. She never wore the collar of colonial subserviency. Her churches and colleges are not endowed of King Charles or Queen Anne. Her lands are not held by grant or prescription under the Duke of York, Lord Fairfax or Lord Baltimore, but by patents under the seal of the young republic, and the hand of George Washington—whose name will continue to be loved and honored throughout the world long after the memory of the last king and peer of Great Britain shall have sunk in oblivion. The early generations of her sons were not reared amid distinctions of wealth and rank and class, but in the primeval forest and prairie, where all stood equal and had no aid to eminence but strenuous effort; where recollections of the sufferings and sacrifices of Revolutionary sires became inspirations of patriotism in their sons, and where nature threw around them all her pure, loving and benignant influences to make them great and strong.

“I now have the pleasure to present to you a typical Buckeye—the architect of his own fame and fortune—who stands below only one man in the republic in official station, and below none in the respect of his countrymen—John Sherman.”

Senator Sherman was applauded many minutes before he was allowed to speak, but when quiet was restored he said:

“I am grateful for this very warm greeting, but if you were to receive every Buckeye from the State of Ohio in this manner you would have the hordes of Ararat among you. Such a reception as this would bring every boy from every farm in the state of Ohio, and what would become of New York then? It was a happy idea to gather the sons of Ohio and those who have been identified with her history in so pleasant a manner as this to preserve the recollections of Ohio boyhood and manhood. Why should you not do this? Why should you not have an Ohio Society as well as New England? Why the citizens from the shores of New England, from Ireland and Scotland and from Germany form their societies in the state of New York, and why should not the state of Ohio, which is more than either of these countries? Now, gentlemen, there is one thing about the Ohio people which has marked them from the beginning of its history, and marks it now—we are a migratory race. We are the innocents abroad. We are a migratory race, and why should we not be, for we deserve the best of any land? When we go to any country, we do not go to rob them, but to aid in their wealth. If I wish to prove this, what better evidence could I desire than the men around me? Here is my friend, General Ewing, who is from one of the garden beds of Ohio, brought up under circumstances that would lead you to suppose that he ought to be content, but he wandered off to Kansas, then to the war and then to Washington, and at the last settles down near New York in the shadow of the shades of the great town. Here is the grandson of William Henry Harrison, and we have representatives of the old Puritan fathers. We have representatives not only of Virginia, but also of Newark, New York and Pennsylvania, all from Ohio. Why, my countrymen, Ohio was the camping ground of all the states. It is true that Vermont and Kentucky and Tennessee were admitted into the Union first, but Ohio was the first fruit of the Federal Union. Every state had a camping ground in Ohio, either reservation by purchase or by settlement. They went there to improve the lands of the wilderness—they made Ohio prosperous. In Ohio was the beginning of that magnificent march westward which leads on to prosperity.

“I want to defend Ohio people against a charge which is often made against them in this city of New York. They charge them with being fond of office. Well, my countrymen, I can show by statistics—and they never lie—that Ohio never had a fair share in public office. There is nothing so dry in an after-dinner speech as figures—they never lie. Well, we have never had our share of public office, but if we have, we always performed the duties with credit. Only one or two other points. In the early times migrations were always westward. Nobody thought of coming East. Therefore it is that the eight sons of Ohio who are now members of the United States Senate all moved westward, which was the star of the Empire. But lately the star of the Empire seems to have settled here in the city of New York, and to-night more than two hundred Ohio men assemble to feast. There is more money in New York than anywhere else. Some of our people have come here to better their conditions, and I hope to God they will—not only to better their own condition, but all those around them. Here are men who have come from Ohio poor, but with honest endeavor to do what is best for their families, and here they are to-night, rich and happy.

“We love Ohio! We love Ohio as our mother, who guarded us in our infancy, and never, my countrymen, although you may hear ill of Ohio, never fail to remember all that is good of Ohio, and be true and noble for the love of Ohio. But we love our country more, and no man from Ohio would ever be true to his mother unless he was more true to his country. Our country forever—from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canada line and away round.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Senator Payne followed, and reviewed the history of the Buckeye state, her advancement, resources and wealth, and paid a glowing tribute to the "men from Ohio," who had conquered in the fight for liberty, independence and constitutional rights.

General Benjamin Harrison, ex-Governor R. M. Bishop and others followed in short speeches, and the company separated.

Of this meeting, George Alfred Townsend, in his dispatch to the Cincinnati Enquirer, said as follows: "Senator Payne distinguished himself at this dinner by the copiousness and simplicity of his remarks and character. He seemed to be a feeble man when he arose, and he is far advanced in life. His voice was not very clear at first, but his conception was earnest. As he went on he seemed to take a new life, and broke out in patriotic praise of Ohio and her sons, among whom he had spent the most of his days. There was a palpable feeling and tenderness in his words, which found responsive chords in all minds; and every time he wavered he was called upon to continue.

"Ben Harrison, senator from Indiana, who is a native of Ohio, showed his metal in a considerable speech, delivered with a vigor and style that carried to my mind the idea that he was an abler man than his distinguished ancestor, the President of the United States. In appearance he does not generally impress people as he goes about the streets, with his head somewhat down and no particular 'get up' about him. But when he rises to speak you see that he is broad-shouldered, full-chested, healthy and strong, square-headed, firmly planted on his feet, aggressive, loud and incisive—very much of a leader of men. In all he made the strongest impression of any speaker of the night.

"It occurred to me that the Ohio Society of New York, which the Irish speaker, Sullivan, fitly characterized as an Irish bull, had better change its name to the 'Ohio Club,' which is brief and to the purpose, and if it designs to take rooms in New York it will be the first organization from the West, and sufficiently indicated by the latter name. One of the originators of the movement said to me: 'In a large city like New York these social organizations are beginning to have an immense influence, and men can hardly find each other without some such facility. A good many men join clubs without any other apparent purpose than to use their letter sheets to write their letters upon, and thus localize themselves in the metropolis. Therefore,' said my informant, 'the Ohio Club has a business utility and significance quite as important as it is friendly in character.'"

It may be a matter of interest for those who have been managing banquet affairs in these later days of prosperity to peruse the report of the entertainment committee made to the Society a short time after the occurrence of this event. It is as follows:

" Mr. Strong's proposition to pay personally for deficiency was declined with thanks. Mr. Sullivan moved that the secretary notify the subscribers of the deficiency and ask a check from each for the same. Carried."

That seems to be the end of the matter so far as the records of the Society give testimony.

Action was taken by the governing committee from time to time in placing the rooms on Fifth Avenue in order and in providing for their care. The chairman was empowered to secure a visitors' register for the rooms, and the first visitor to place his name upon the record was William Jones, of Coburg, Canada, introduced by J. J. Slocum, on May 21, 1886.

Mr. Follett moved that the chairman appoint three members to act as house committee, and that official named Messrs. Moulton, Lee and Pool, and said committee were instructed to complete the furnishing of the rooms and make the necessary purchases. The thanks of the Society, on motion of General Swayne, were extended to Mrs. Hannah B. Strong for a handsome copy of the Bible. The Hon. R. B. Hayes was elected a non-resident member rather than an honorary member, at his own request.

The first meeting of the Society in the rooms at No. 236 Fifth avenue was held on June 14, 1886. In the absence of the president, Vice-President W. L. Strong presided. General Henry L. Burnett, chairman of the governing committee, reported that the expense of fitting up the rooms so far amounted to about $1,500. Mr. Howard, chairman of the committee on literature, history and art, offered the following resolution, which was adopted: "Resolved, That the committee on history and art be requested to assign to suitable members of this Society appropriate subjects relative to the history of Ohio, with a view

* The "Ex" in this case means "extras." At the last moment it was discovered that the affair was likely to be "dry," and an order was given by those in charge that obviated that difficulty.

to having biographical essays or historical papers prepared, to be read at each monthly meeting of the Society."

Mr. Howard then read a paper relating to some of Ohio's most noted sons, and, on motion, the same was ordered to be printed.

C. W. Moulton, on behalf of the house committee, stated that a considerable number of newspapers from the state of Ohio had been received for filing, and that a number of other publishers had expressed their willingness to send their papers soon. Mr. Pool, of the house committee, reported progress in fitting up the rooms. H. L. Burnett moved that an auditing committee, composed of three members, be appointed by the chair to examine the expenditures of the governing committee to this time. This was concurred in by Mr. Fogg, the treasurer, and the chair named John W. Harman, Warren Higley and Leander H. Crall as such committee.

At the meeting of July 12th this committee made a report to the effect that they found everything in first-class shape, and took occasion to compliment Colonel Fogg, the treasurer, for the neat and handsome manner in which his accounts were kept, and for the ready manner in which his vouchers were produced. They characterized his books as a marvel of neatness, and his accounts as in every way intelligible.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on history and art, reported the following subjects as having been arranged for subsequent meetings, stating that he expected the reading of these papers would be begun by the August meeting:

"The First Settlement at Marietta," Mr. John Q. Mitchell.

"The Second Settlement at Cincinnati," Judge Warren Higley.

"The Administration of Governor Arthur St. Clair," William Henry Smith.

"Thomas Corwin," General Thomas Ewing.

"The First Constitution of Ohio and Its Framers," General Henry L. Burnett.

"The Second Constitution of Ohio and the Chief Men Who Made It," Algernon S. Sullivan.

"Thomas Ewing and Hocking Hunter," General Wager Swayne.

"The Character and Career of Hiram Powers," James H. Beard.

"The Public Services of Salmon P. Chase," Whitelaw Reid.

It was decided that when the Society should adjourn at the close of this meeting, it should be until the second Monday in September. On motion, the president was authorized to extend the thanks of the Society to Mrs. Alice Bernard for a crayon portrait of Hon. John Sherman, and the house committee were instructed to have it framed.

dent Ewing in the chair. J. Q. Mitchell read a very interesting paper entitled "The First Settlement at Marietta."

The governing committee were instructed to have this paper, and also one offered by Mr. Howard, printed in a uniform style, and copies of these distributed to the members of the Society without delay.

It was at this meeting that the custom of adopting resolutions in honor of deceased members seems to have been inaugurated.* The chair was instructed to appoint a committee of three to take action in regard to the decease of several members of the Society, and appointed J. W. Harman, Warren Higley and Cyrus Butler. The members who had died were William Hunter and J. Monroe Brown. The secretary was instructed to write to Judge Manning F. Force and General Jacob D. Cox, asking them to furnish the Society with papers on the Mound Builders. At the meeting of October 11th James H. Beard delivered an interesting address on Hiram Powers, replete with reminiscences of art in Ohio in early days, and Mr. Kimball presented the Society with a history of Stark county.

At the meeting of November 8th General Burnett, on behalf of the governing committee, stated that preliminary steps had been taken by that committee to arrange for the next annual banquet. Judge Warren Higley read a very interesting paper on "The Second Settlement of Ohio at Cincinnati." A vote of thanks was tendered, and the paper ordered printed, and that copies, together with those of previously printed papers, be sent to each member as well as to the representative newspapers of Ohio.

Milton I. Southard offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That the committee on history and art be requested to examine into and determine upon the general character and quantity required of such papers as may be read and printed under the auspices of the Society, and then refer the matter to the governing committee for printing." It was adopted.

A discussion then occurred concerning the election of officers for the ensuing year, and a nominating committee of seven were provided for by motion. On motion of General Burnett, the resolution ordering this committee was amended in that the nomination and terms of service of members for the governing committee be also referred to the same committee, with power to act. The chairman named the following gentlemen as members of the nominating committee: P. B. Armstrong, Warren Higley, William Henry Smith, Cyrus Butler, William Ford Upson, J. Q. Howard, William H. Beard.

* Appropriate action has been taken by the Society from time to time upon all its members who have passed away, and the resolutions and memorials appear in full in the minutes. It was thought wisest to refer here only to the action taken in exceptional and conspicuous cases.

CHAPTER III

THE first annual meeting of the Ohio Society of New York was held at the rooms on November 29, 1886. The reports of the various officers and committees were presented. They form a valuable summary of the work already accomplished.

That of the governing committee was especially full of data and suggestions, and the most salient portions are here reproduced:

“The by-laws require that the committee shall meet at least once a month, and provide that five members shall constitute a quorum, except during July, August and September, when three shall constitute a quorum. The committee held its first meeting January 16th and its last on November 17th, and during this eleven months held twenty meetings. The interest of a majority of the members of the committee in the welfare of the Society and an earnest desire to discharge with faithfulness and efficiency the duties which had been imposed upon them by the Society was at all times manifest. At the regular and at the called meetings there has usually been a good attendance.

“The duties imposed upon the governing committee by the by-laws were (a) the admission of new members; (b) to control and manage the property of the Society and enforce obedience to its rules; (c) to make all expenditures and all contracts on behalf of the Society; and (d) generally to manage the affairs of the Society, and at regular meetings recommend such action by the Society as it may deem advisable.

“The governing committee, during the year, has passed upon and elected two hundred and sixty-eight members; the other twenty-three became members either by subscribing to the original constitution or by direct action of the Society.

“The next step taken by the committee in managing the affairs of the Society was to secure attractive and commodious permanent rooms or headquarters for the Society. After careful consideration of the subject and personal examination of rooms in various localities by several members of the committee, the present rooms at 236 Fifth avenue were unanimously selected. On the 13th day of March, 1886, the president and secretary of the Society and the chairman of the governing committee, on behalf of the Society, entered into a written agreement with the Messrs. Everall to lease said rooms for the term of one year from May 1, 1886, for the sum of $2,250, and the right of renewal from year to year thereafter for five years at the yearly rental of $2,500. The committee feel assured that the lease is an excellent one in a financial point of view for the Society, and that the locality is most convenient and desirable.

“ A sub-committee of the governing committee was appointed to take charge of the repairs, changes and furnishing necessary to fit the rooms for occupancy. This was accomplished as rapidly as possible and on the 26th of May a card was issued to the members, notifying them that the rooms were then substantially in order and ready for the use of members. At the meeting held on said 26th of May a sub-committee of the governing committee, consisting of Moulton, Pool and Lee, were appointed a house committee, which should thereafter have special charge of the rooms and make such further purchases as were necessary to complete the furnishing of the rooms. The report of said committee through its chairman, Colonel Moulton, is hereto appended and is commended as a very full and complete report of the work of the house committee in the performance of its duties.

“ The total cost of the furnishing and fitting of the rooms was $1,832.37. Of this sum about $500 was expended in construction of water-closets, wash-room, coat-room, ventilators and plumbing work, leaving about $1,300 as the total cost of furniture, carpets, draperies, etc.; i.e., in furnishing proper. For more particular specification of the expenditures, reference is made to the annual report of the treasurer.

“ Of the 291 members elected, 229 were resident members and 62 non-resident; 232 have paid both the initiation fee and annual dues and 262 have paid initiation fee.

“ The treasurer reports, on November 20, 1886, the total receipts.	$5,755.00
“ Of this sum there has been expended under the orders of the governing committee, for construction and furnishing of rooms..	1,832.37
“ Printing, stationery, etc.....	652.65
“ Rent, attendance and current petty expenses.....	1,976.45

“ Total expenditures.....	$4,461.47
“ Leaving balance in hand of treasurer.....	$1,293.53

“ The committee estimate that it will require about $4,000 to meet the actual fixed expenses of the club for the coming year. For the Society to have an income of this amount there must be 225 certain paying members at $15 each, and at least 27 new members paying initiation fee and annual dues of $25, or the equivalent of this in resident and non-resident and new members.

“The committee, by way of suggestion or recommendation, beg to say that in order to maintain the requisite membership a sustained interest in the monthly meetings and in the general purposes and objects of the Society must be manifested by the present members. First: There ought to be a greater attendance, a more frequent dropping in of the members to the rooms of the Society afternoons and evenings. It might be well for the Society or governing committee to designate some special evening each week as Ohio Society night, when it shall be understood that as many of the members as can possibly do so will visit the rooms.

“No more attractive feature could possibly be added to the Society rooms than to fill them comfortably full with the cultivated, able and attractive men who constitute its membership. ‘All place a temple; all season summer’ where such men do congregate.

“Then again, while the papers read at our monthly meetings are most interesting and instructive, are filled and weighty with great truths and historic facts, yet may they not be just a little depressing, from their very ponderosity? Might it not be well to lighten a little the great load of historic facts, of robust reasoning and massive wisdom shoveled on to the average intellect on these occasions, by a little music—a sprightly duet or a stirring glee song? I doubt not we have the talent. Our committee on history, literature and art might brighten the sombre tints of the evening by a choice recitation or reading. Why can we not have the presence of ladies at our monthly meetings or semi-monthly meetings? Their presence would certainly bring into our rooms Matthew Arnold’s vision of ‘Sweetness and light.’ It has also been suggested that by concerted arrangement members of the Society, or a large number, might meet once a week and dine together at Morelli’s or some such place, after the manner of the Twilight Club. The dinner would be good and moderate in price—not more than a dollar each, without wine—and nothing would tend more to build up the fraternity of feeling, the good comradeship and personal attachments among members, which are the best foundations for Society existence. It might be well also, during the winter, for the Society to invite some of our many eminent non-resident members to come here and give a public lecture or lectures on some burning question of the hour. The expenses could be met by voluntary subscription, and the lectures being of a high standard, and given under the auspices of the Ohio Society, would give us a place in the literary and intellectual life of our city and time. These suggestions are thrown out for the thoughtful consideration of the Society. To continue to live as a Society we must be very much alive, and show that we are worthy to live. “HENRY L. BURNETT, Chairman Governing Committee.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The following are extracts from the report of the house committee referred to above: "Book cases are becoming necessary, but have not yet been provided. The supply of newspapers and periodicals is shown by schedule of superintendent, annexed hereto; dailies, 18; weeklies, 23—total, 41. Of the above all are contributed. Since last May two hundred visitors have inscribed their names in a book kept for that purpose, and perhaps as many more called at the rooms but neglected to register. Ever since the rooms were opened the interest manifested by members of the Society has fully justified the expenditure incurred in leasing and furnishing these apartments. Your committee is gratified to be able to report that the property of the Society is in good order, and with the few additions added there will be no necessity for any considerable outlay for house furnishings during the coming year."

The first annual report of the secretary, Homer Lee, was also replete with information. It will be recalled that at one of the meetings already reported a committee, of which Mr. Lee was a member, was appointed, with instructions to prepare a history of the origin of the Society. He apparently took this occasion to present the information asked for. The report was as follows:

"NEW YORK, November 29, 1886.

"To the members of the Ohio Society of New York. Gentlemen: The secretary begs leave to submit the following sketch of the several attempts at the formation of societies composed of Ohio men and of the work of the Ohio Society of New York for the past year:

"The first step of which any record can be found towards establishing an Ohio Society was a call printed in the Boston papers on the 25th day of January, 1786, not quite one hundred and one years ago, when eleven delegates met at the Bunch of Grapes tavern in Boston and organized by electing General Rufus Putnam president and Winthrop Sargent secretary. This was undoubtedly the first Ohio Society. It was called the 'Ohio Company of Associates,' and was intended to promote emigration to Ohio and to develop that portion of the national domain, then a part of the state of Virginia.

"The next step taken was at the outbreak of the civil war, when there was formed in the parlors of one of Ohio's fair daughters residing on Murray Hill, in this city, a society composed mainly of Ohio ladies and gentlemen, which held weekly meetings, and which was afterwards known throughout the land as the Sanitary Fair.

"The object was to send supplies, clothing, medicines, etc., to the soldiers at the front. A handsome silk and satin banner was made at a cost of some $500, upon which was a beautifully embroidered coat of arms of the state of Ohio, to be presented to the bravest Ohio regiment. As might have been expected, there was much rivalry for the possession of this prize, as glowing descriptions of the beautiful souvenir were given by the newspapers at that time. The commanding officers were appealed to, but could not be prevailed upon to decide the question, because, as one officer put it, 'It could not easily be decided which was the bravest where all the regiments by their valor and heroism had covered themselves with glory.' At the close of the war the Seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, of Cleveland, secured the prize. This, however, was not carried further, but several members of our Society were among the number, as follows: William L. Strong, Augustus D. Juilliard, Theron R. Butler, Albert W. Green, Thomas Reed, A. Jennings, D. M. Porter, Samuel Hawk, Frank Work, Clinton Work, Joel Reed.

"The Ohio Soldiers' Aid Society was formed about the same time at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, of which Theron R. Butler was elected president and John R. Cecil treasurer. Committees were appointed to assist all the sick and wounded soldiers belonging to Ohio regiments, from the army of the Potomac, that could be found in the hospitals of New York and vicinity. Hundreds of disabled men were sent home, transportation free. Over $15,000 were expended in this good work.

"About twenty privates, belonging to a Dayton regiment, were found in a Jewish hospital uptown, who, true to their Ohio instinct, longed for pork, which was rather difficult to get at that place, but those in charge, recognizing their wishes, informed Colonel Strong, chairman of the disbursing committee, and the result was a splendid feast of Cincinnati pork sent up from Delmonico's in baskets, which was much enjoyed.

"Upon the occasion of the funeral of the late Honorable Salmon P. Chase, in 1877, the subject again came up and was warmly discussed by a large number of Ohioans who were residents of New York at that time, but no decisive steps were taken. Several of the gentlemen who were the most active are also members of the Ohio Society. Among them were Henry L. Burnett, Whitelaw Reid, S. S. Cox, A. S. Sullivan and others.

"Some of the younger Ohioans in New York again endeavored to form an Ohio Society in the winter of 1874. Several meetings were held at the Hotel St. Germain, Broadway and Twenty-second street, where they endeavored to put the Buckeye Club on its feet. This, also, was but a glimmer. Several of these are likewise among the present members of the Society, viz.: William M. Hoffer, Giles N. Howlett, Henry C. Ehlers, Homer Lee.

"Still another and last attempt was the one out of which the present Society sprang. It was rewarded with better success, however, for when a paper was circulated in this city, about a year ago, to see whether a dozen Buckeyes could be united on this matter it was found that over thirty responded, and with such spirit and enthusiasm that there was no longer any doubt that the time had at last arrived for organization."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Mr. Lee's report then reproduced the call, already given, and followed with a brief recital of the facts as given in the record preceding this.

After the presentation of reports the chair announced that the election of officers and of a governing committee for the ensuing year was in order, and the following gentlemen were elected: President, Thomas Ewing; vice-presidents, Whitelaw Reid, Wager Swayne, A. S. Sullivan, William L. Strong, William Henry Smith; secretary, Homer Lee; recording secretary, John Q. Mitchell; treasurer, William Perry Fogg; governing committee, three years, Henry L. Burnett, Andrew J. C. Foyé, George Follett; two years, Joseph Pool, John Dickson, William H. Eckert; one year, Charles W. Moulton, S. B. Elkins, J. J. Slocum. It was ordered that the committee on entertainment and the history and art committee be increased from seven to nine members.

On December 6, 1886, a special meeting of the Society was held for the discussion of the question, "On what date was Ohio admitted as a state into the Federal Union?" Letters were read from General Ewing and William Henry Smith, regretting their inability to be present and to participate in the discussion. Mr. Smith's letter contained a concise argument upon the question under discussion.

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on December 13th, General Henry L. Burnett was elected chairman and J. Q. Mitchell secretary for the coming year. At a meeting of the Society on the same date those present were entertained by an interesting and instructive paper by William Henry Smith upon the life and public services of Jeremiah Morrow, once governor of Ohio.

It seems appropriate at this point, the close of 1886, to speak with some detail of the first manual or year-book of the Society. It was a small paper-covered pamphlet, about 6 by 4½ inches in size, containing twenty-eight pages, exclusive of the cover.

The title page was as follows:

CONSTITUTION,
BY-LAWS,
OFFICERS AND MEMBERS
OF THE
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

CHAPTER IV

THE first official action of 1887 was taken on January 4th, at a meeting of the governing committee, when the chairman appointed a house committee, consisting of Messrs. Moulton, Lee and Slocum, to serve the ensuing year. Colonel Fogg, acting with the house committee, was directed to prepare and cause to be printed a circular letter in the form of an application for non-resident membership, to be widely distributed among those eligible for such membership. The house committee was instructed to prepare and have printed cards of invitation to visitors. The secretary was directed to cause to be kept in the rooms a bulletin of the arrivals in the city of Ohio people.

The first meeting of the Society for 1887 was held on January 10th. Attorney-General Kohler favored the gathering with remarks upon the present prosperity and prospects of the state of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. Butler, the Society voted to hold a ladies' reception on the evening of January 31st, and a special committee was appointed to arrange for the same, consisting of Messrs. Butler, Burnett and Upson.

There was a gratifying attendance of members of the fairer sex on the occasion named. One of the features of the entertainment provided was an original poem of ten stanzas, dedicated to "The Boys of the Ohio Society of New York," by its author, Prof. J. C. Zachos. The tone and tenor may be judged from the opening and concluding stanzas, which were as follows :

"I greet you all, Ohio Boys,
Reminders of my youthful joys,
When games, and school, and college toys
Filled up the fresh, young life:
I take your hand in friendship's grasp,
For cordial love and faithful clasp,
In manhood's noble strife.

"And thus we give the manly grasp,
Unselfish, in our friendship's clasp,
Where faith and love we find;
We'll take each other by the hand,
Ohio's sons—fraternal band—
Where'er we find them in the land,
And love them for their kind."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

"The Buckeye Tree" was another original poem prepared for the occasion, and was read by its author, Cyrus Butler. Of the seven decidedly unique stanzas, the first three are reproduced:

"A wonderful plant is the Buckeye Tree—In O-hi-o, in O-hi-o!

"A decidedly deciduous tree,
Umbrageous to a prodigious degree—In O-hi-o, in O-hi-o!

"An exogenous, horse-chestnutty tree,
That grows and that blooms spontaneouslee,
As the botanist all over can see—In O-hi-o, in O-hi-o."

"Pandora's Message," a third poem, accompanied by the presentation of "gifts," "amulets" and "blessings," completed the entertainment of the evening.

The question was taken up in the meeting of February 14th as to the character of the annual banquet of 1887, and on motion of Judge Higley the matter was referred to a committee of arrangements, with instructions to select a date as soon after the close of the Lenten season as practicable, consisting of the following named gentlemen: Samuel Thomas, C. W. Moulton, J. A. Bostwick, A. W. Green, Joseph Pool, A. J. C. Foyé, Homer Lee, W. L. Strong, Judge Higley, General Ewing and General Burnett.

Col. C. W. Moulton, on behalf of the artist, Miss Marion Foster, presented to the Society a crayon portrait of Gen. Thomas Ewing, and Colonel Fogg was directed to extend to the donor the warm thanks of the Society for her gift, and assurances of its grateful acceptance, and also to have the picture suitably framed.

The Society was favored with an instructive historical address by General Eaton, of Marietta College, and a very interesting speech by Col. A. L. Conger. A committee, consisting of Messrs. Chance, Peixotto and Upson, was appointed to procure for the Society portraits of some of Ohio's eminent men. The question of providing for the Society a memorial album, and the portraits and autographs of its members, was referred to the art committee. A committee, consisting of Judge Higley, R. Harwood Pool, Carson Lake, Homer Lee and John Q. Mitchell, was appointed to make the necessary arrangements for a second ladies' reception, to be held on the last Monday evening in February.

The gentlemen entrusted with this pleasant task set themselves to work immediately, and succeeded in securing the consent of the following named ladies to act as a reception committee: Mrs. C. W. Moulton, Mrs. Joseph Pool, Mrs. J. Q. Howard, Mrs. W. L. Strong, Mrs. A. J. C. Foyé, Mrs. M. I.

Southard. A notice was sent to the members notifying them that the evening of February 28th had been set aside for the gathering, and adding: "The success of the first Ladies' Night gives confidence in the success of those to follow; and the committee takes pleasure in announcing that arrangements have been made for the next one, which promises many good things. Tickets, admitting gentleman and two ladies, are one dollar each. Your presence is respectfully requested."

A further announcement was made that among the distinguished Ohioans who had kindly consented to contribute to the pleasure of the evening were: Mme. Eugenie de Roodé, the pianist; Mrs. Eliza Archard Connor, of the Am. Press Association; Mrs. Harriet Webb, the elocutionist; Mr. Wilbur Gunn, Miss Belle Cole, and Mrs. Marion Wilcox. Also that the following artists would contribute paintings: Albert Bierstadt, Edgar M. Ward, G. D. M. Peixotto, J. O. Davidson, J. H. Beard, S. J. Guy, Miss Belle Smith, and others.

The following were among the invited guests: Gen. and Mrs. W. T. Sherman and Miss Sherman, Hon. Geo. H. Pendleton, Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield and family, ex-Gov. and Mrs. Hoadly, Col. and Mrs. C. O. Rockwell, Col. and Mrs. Fred D. Grant, Hon. John W. Bookwalter, Hon. Howard Douglas. A collation was to be served by Morelli.

The anticipations of the committee in charge seem to have been fully realized. In an account of their stewardship, rendered to the Society under date of March 14th, they say: "The number present was estimated at two hundred and fifty, which the committee deemed quite satisfactory in view of the fact that the Lenten season was in full force, and the first Ladies' Night had occurred but a month before.

"The committee was especially fortunate in securing the hearty contributions of song, of music, of recitation, of address, from the following well-known artistes, whose rendition of their several numbers elicited the highest commendation of those present: Mr. Wilbur Gunn, Mrs. Harriet Webb, Mme. Eugenie de Roodé, Marion Wilcox and Eliza Archard Connor.

"Excellent works of art were kindly loaned by George D. M. Peixotto, S. J. Guy, Homer Lee, Cyrus Butler, Carson Lake, J. H. Beard, Rev. Jared B. Flagg, Richard Butler, W. H. Beard and Isabella Smith, and were artistically hung under the kind supervision of Mr. Cyrus Butler."

All bills were reported paid and a small surplus left in the hands of the committee. The programme of the evening, and the list of pictures on exhibition, were as follows:

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on March 10th, the resolution that follows was adopted:

“WHEREAS, a number of editors in the state of Ohio have very kindly and generously furnished their papers to be placed on file in the rooms of the Society for the use of its members, be it therefore,

“Resolved, That in recognition of their courtesy and generosity, the secretary of this committee be instructed to notify the gentlemen thus contributing their papers, that all the privileges of non-resident membership in this Society are hereby extended to them, and that copies of all notices of meetings and publications of the Society in future be sent to their addresses.”

It was ordered that the house committee should be increased from three members to five. Andrew J. C. Foyé and John Dickson were selected as the two additional members.

The March meeting of the Society was held on the 14th. General Burnett, chairman of the governing committee, recommended the renewal for one year of the lease under which the Society occupied its present quarters. The chairman of the annual banquet committee reported that April 21st had been selected as the most suitable date for the banquet, and that the committee had decided to invite the ladies. The Society was favored by ex-Gov. George Hoadly in a brief speech.

Mr. Chance, chairman, read a report from the special committee appointed to procure for the Society portraits of Ohio's distinguished men. The report was accepted and the committee continued. The document presented was as follows:

“The committee appointed at the last meeting of the Society, to obtain the portraits of eminent and distinguished sons of Ohio, for this Society, beg leave to submit the following: As the rooms of this Society are limited, the space would not accommodate a tithe of those deserving to adorn our walls; and for this reason, if for no other, there must be some discrimination in their selection. Representative men should be chosen, and we do not feel like taking this responsibility without conference and the concurrence of the Society. We would suggest that the first efforts should be made to secure the portraits of those men who have achieved a national reputation and a world-wide fame, whose names are household words throughout the length and breadth of the land. List of names:

“1. The four presidents of the United States, Wm. Henry Harrison, Ulysses S. Grant, Rutherford B. Hayes and James A. Garfield.

“2. General Sherman, General Sheridan, General James B. McPherson.

“3. Chief Justices Salmon P. Chase and Morrison R. Waite, Associate Justices John McLean and Noah H. Swayne.

“4. Edwin M. Stanton.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ 5. Vice-President Thomas A. Hendricks, Benjamin F. Wade, Thomas Ewing, Thomas Corwin, John Sherman and Allen G. Thurman.

“ 6. The Governors of the state of Ohio and ex-Governors of the state.

“ The Presidents of the Ohio Society of New York.

“ There will be many difficulties and delays in securing these portraits, and we have no doubt by the time this list is placed the Ohio Society will have grown to such magnificent proportions and enlarged its facilities that we can take care of many more than these named.

“ There is a long line of senators, representatives, soldiers and jurists, eminent sculptors, poets, divines, scholars and writers that we should honor: but it would be impossible to put upon our walls the portraits of the smallest proportion of those we could obtain, and in the invitations or withholding invitation to gentlemen equally distinguished in service there might arise a feeling of unjust discrimination. There are many who might not contribute, but there are certain things, like custom, more honored in the breach than in the observance, and in this care should be taken not to offend sensibilities or prejudice the Society.

“ The committee desire to say that in the selection of portraits a reasonable degree of uniformity as to size and so forth should be indicated to the donors.

“ Respectfully submitted,

“ MAHLON CHANCE,

“ WM. FORD UPSON,

“ Committee.”

On motion of Judge Higley, George D. M. Peixotto was authorized to paint for the Society a portrait of Chief Justice Waite.

The session of April 11th was enlivened by a notice from Colonel Moulton, on behalf of the governing committee, that an amendment to the by-laws would be offered at the next meeting, forbidding any reception committee of the Society from expending more than the receipts. A present of the statutes of Ohio, from the beginning of its organization to the year 1852, and a copy of the code of 1853, was received from John M. Guiteau, Esq., and a vote of thanks was extended to the donor. A loan, for an indefinite period, of an oil portrait of Thomas Ewing was received from Colonel and Mrs. Moulton, which was accepted by the president, Gen. Thomas Ewing, in behalf of the Society, in a brief speech, giving an interesting history of the picture and attesting its value as a portrait. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

“ Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York hereby expresses to Mrs. Col. C. W. Moulton its high sense of appreciation for the loan of the original portrait of the Hon. Thomas Ewing, whose illustrious services in the councils of the state and nation have made his memory dear to every American heart; and,

“Resolved, That the Society will safely guard this portrait, in trust, and while hoping that the trust may be made perpetual, will surrender it to Mrs. Col. Moulton whenever that gracious lady shall request its return.”

The second annual festal gathering of the Society was held on the evening of Thursday, April 21st, 1887. The committee of arrangements having the matter in charge consisted of the following gentlemen: Henry L. Burnett, Thomas Ewing, William L. Strong, Warren Higley, Samuel Thomas, J. A. Bostwick, C. W. Moulton, Homer Lee, Albert W. Green, Joseph Pool, Andrew J. C. Foyé. They were assisted by the following ladies: Mesdames Thomas Ewing, George Hoadly, William L. Strong, Henry L. Burnett, Algernon S. Sullivan, Anson G. McCook, Samuel Thomas, Wallace C. Andrews, Calvin S. Brice, Stephen B. Elkins, Joseph Pool and Miss Green.

The affair was a success in the widest acceptance of the term. This was vouched for publicly in one of the leading newspapers of the succeeding morning,* which said: “The Ohio Society of New York celebrated its first anniversary at Delmonico’s about a year ago, with a highly successful dinner. This year the members gallantly determined to give their wives, daughters and sweethearts a share in the festivities. So the dinner, with its set speeches, was given up and a reception, ball and supper substituted. Gen. Thomas Ewing made a speech of welcome, standing on a little platform in the ball-room, amid the patronesses and chaperons, while the younger people waited for the music and the forming of the first quadrille. But beyond that everything was an easy, pleasant come-and-go, with hand-shakings and talk in the reception rooms, lounging or walking in the corridors, and short, varied dances in the big ball-room. Supper was served in one of the small dining-rooms soon after midnight. There was no regular cotillon.”

The ball-room was gaily decorated with plants and flowers. Bunches of red or white roses hung in the spaces on the walls between the mirrors, and in each corner was a mass of palms, through which pushed the top branches of a buckeye tree just about to bud. The music gallery was trimmed in wreaths, and there were festoons of flowers from window to window on the north and south ends of the room.

The buckeye tree had been sent on for the reception by the citizens of Findlay, Ohio. There was a card tied about a stem of the tree on which a long and, perhaps, jocose dedication was written. The tree, it was said, had come from good buckeye soil, for 1,100 feet beneath the surface where the horse chestnuts grew, an inexhaustible supply of high pressure natural gas was met with.

The first guests began to arrive at about half-past eight o'clock, and the reception proper lasted until nearly ten.

President Thomas Ewing and Mrs. Algernon Sullivan led the march out into the ball-room. Lander's orchestra played a lively air while the big procession made a turn or two, and as the seats about the hall began to fill and the crowd from the outside pushed in on the smooth floor, General Ewing stepped out a little from the corner, where the reception committee had its quarters under the buckeye tree, to give a brief speech of welcome. He talked rather than spoke, in fact, turning his sentences off lightly and familiarly. This is what he said:

“Ladies and Gentlemen: In the name of the Ohio Society of New York I cordially bid you welcome to its second annual reunion. It celebrated its first by a dinner at Delmonico's nearly a year ago, when its career had as yet scarcely begun. We then went through the round of champagne and oratory common to men's societies in New York. The speaking was, in our opinion, especially excellent—almost every orator being a candidate for the presidency, and doing his level best.

“To-night we intend to steer clear of politics and break all precedents by having a banquet and ball and a good social time with our wives and daughters. We can afford to be peculiar. We did not organize this Society after an Eastern pattern. We are not perishing to be considered ‘in good form,’ but we are willing to be a little odd if we can have a pleasanter reunion by it. As for the oratory, in view of our acknowledged success of last year, we will forego it at this reunion, if only to give the New England Society a chance to catch up.

“A year ago last January our Society was founded. It began with one hundred and fifteen members and now has four hundred. Its two informal social receptions, which were graced by the presence of many of the wives and daughters of our members, served to strengthen interest in it and add largely to its membership. Our rooms are becoming small for our numbers, and the time is not distant when we shall need more commodious quarters. It requires but a continuance of the interest heretofore shown to insure the permanent foundation of the Society in a building of its own, supported by a membership of double our present number.

“While I have the pleasure of looking into the bright and beautiful faces of the ladies before me, I wish to ask them for their help in building up the Society. We have to thank some of them for valued contributions to our rooms already made, and others for contributions promised. Any gifts or loans of portraits of eminent Ohio men or women, books of history, biography, or general literature, especially if connected in any manner with our state, will be welcomed. We are founding a library in which is already collected more of the history of Ohio than can be seen in most of the great libraries of the East. Send us books—our shelf-room is ample and will be enlarged to keep up with the contributions. We are also having historical and biographical papers prepared by members and read before the Society, some of which have been published. We would be most happy to have sketches of the lives of memorable Ohio women, read to us in person or by proxy, by any who may find it convenient and agreeable to do such work.

“The glory of the state is due to the virtues and talents of her women, equally with her men. Great men generally have mothers of great character, who are themselves born of great men of the preceding generation. Many of the daughters of the foremost leaders of the Revolution were mothers of heroes of the Civil War. Nature thus distributes high qualities between the sexes, turn about, and with an even hand. To preserve and transmit the environments, the achievements and the characteristics of the men and women who have placed Ohio in the front rank of states, and to do all that can best be done in fostering a just pride in her and a friendly intercourse among her absent children, are among the objects of our Society, and surely it is as appropriate to look for help to the daughters as to the sons of Ohio.

“This is an era of innovation in all things. I think no line of innovation more desirable to pursue than in bringing together men and women of character and culture, in social reunions founded on common sympathies, rather than on the accidents which establish the circles of modern society. Of course, a good-hearted, refined and intelligent woman is always charming, no matter whether she come from Europe or America, Ohio or New York. But if she comes from Ohio and knows of its history, its public characters, or its social life, I confess that I like to meet her all the better, for then we have a hundred ties in common, and are friends from the outset. We rush away every summer, and often in winter, by a sort of imperative impulse, largely to get out of the ruts of our social sets, and we breathe freer for meeting new people and touching elbows with mankind. Our views and sympathies expand and we come back to our little circle and feel cramped as we settle down in it. When I attend a meeting of the Ohio Society, and talk with the men coming from all parts of the state, talk of their counties and towns, their social life, their politics, their industries, and the people past and present associated with them, I come away feeling as if I had made a leisurely visit around Ohio; for, after all, its men and women are the state, while its scenery is only associated with their lives and actions.

“Ohio had an early history of peculiar trial and hardship, and out of them came its greatness. It was settled by poor men and women, stripped by the long war of the Revolution of all their possessions, except hope and courage. They braved perils of savage men and beasts rarely known in the settlement of other states. In my youth I often heard from the now silent lips of women of that era, from the accomplished and charming Mrs. General Goddard, of Zanesville; Mrs. King, of Lancaster; Mrs. Morgan, of Champaign county, and from my father's sisters, tales of heroism of Ohio women, which seemed to me loftier and finer than any of the published tales of the frontier. I have a recent letter from a kinswoman in Westfield, N. J., telling me of a visit made to Cumberland county, in that state, in the year 1789, by a lady from the Northwest Territory, who came here to see her parents and relatives. She was the wife of a soldier of the Revolution who had emigrated to the far West after the war was ended. She had made the long journey from the Ohio, over river and mountain, by flood and fell, through an almost trackless wilderness, on horseback, alone, carrying a boy baby in her arms. I know you will pardon me the vanity of saying that that lady was my grandmother and the baby my father.

“There are hundreds of like instances of dauntless love among the women who early settled the Northwest, which are worthy to become historic. Must the memory of their high virtues perish because displayed only by women and in the wilderness? And can we not find among us women's pens and tongues to revive and tell these stories of love and patriotism to our Society, and through it to the world?”

“Come, then, Ohio women of New York, meet Ohio men in these reunions and help us to lay broad and deep the foundations of this Society, which will cultivate fellowship among Ohio's sons and daughters here, and keep alive the memory of all that has made our state worthy of the love and pride of her children.

“And now, after the welcome and exhortation, which I am sure you will applaud me for stopping, let the dance and banquet begin.”

There was a round of warm applause as General Ewing closed. Then the band struck up a quadrille air from “Erminie” and the floor was soon filled with dancers. General Sherman came in late from the Twelfth regiment reception, but quickly got into the dances. There were sixteen of these on the programme, carrying the gayeties far through the supper and beyond into the morning.

The statement was made at the meeting of May 11th, by General Burnett, chairman of the banquet committee, that the reception of the Society was a pleasant success; that the receipts of the committee from the sale of tickets were $972, and that the total expense was $1,139, an excess of $167 over the receipts.

On motion of Colonel Strong, a committee consisting of General Ewing,

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

General Burnett, Colonel Moulton, J. Q. Howard and Judge Higley were appointed to select a date on which the annual celebration of the Society should in future be held. The name of Colonel Strong was added to this committee. It was decided that the monthly meetings of the Society in July and August should be omitted.

A paper entitled, "Garfield, the Statesman," was read by Mr. Howard at the meeting of June 13th, and remarks were made by Dr. Zachos, General Burnett, Colonel Moulton and Colonel Loveland.

The quiet of the mid-summer of 1887, when the Society was officially taking its long vacation, was pleasantly interrupted by an invitation from the Fall of Babylon Amusement Co. to witness the performance of "the Fall," at St. George, Staten Island, on Thursday evening, July 21st. This invitation had been accepted and it was determined in connection therewith to take dinner at the Casino, adjoining the grounds of the performance, on that evening. All members of the Society and their friends, including ladies, were cordially invited. The call was signed by President Ewing and seventeen other members, constituting a committee of arrangements. As the inclemency of the weather prevented the exhibition on the date named it was postponed to Wednesday evening, July 27th.

Two hundred of the members and their wives and daughters sat down to dinner in the Casino on the evening last named. Algernon S. Sullivan, a vice-president, in the absence of General Thomas Ewing, president of the Society, was seated at the centre of the presiding officer's table. At his right was Senator Plumb, of Kansas, and at his left General Wager Swayne. Mahlon Chance, Wm. Perry Fogg, Judge Warren Higley and Major H. A. Glassford occupied prominent places near the chairman. At the other tables were: W. H. Eckert, Thomas Ewing, Jr., and Miss Ewing, Dr. J. C. Zachos and Miss Zachos, Col. C. W. Moulton, Washington Belt, ex-Gov. George Hoadly, Gen. H. L. Burnett, Homer Lee, Carey W. Moore, Cyrus Butler, A. J. C. Foyé, J. Q. Mitchell, George Follett, John W. Stout, Capt. J. P. Walker, United States Army; J. J. Struble, F. W. Sterling, Col. W. L. Strong, C. C. Shayne, Colonel Slocum, J. Q. Howard, J. H. Bunnell, A. W. Follett, C. H. Applegate, J. M. Guiteau, Amos A. Bard, Jerome D. Gillett, Colgate Hoyt, Col. Colin Goddard, M. I. Southard, Calvin S. Brice, Joseph Pool, Sherman Moulton, L. H. Crall, Carson Lake and David Pritchard. Fully one-third of the seats were occupied by ladies.

When justice had been done to the dinner, Mr. Sullivan called the Society to order, and after expressing regret at the absence of General Ewing, congratulated his fellow-Ohioans upon the wonderful growth and progress of the Society, and introduced as a distinguished son of Ohio, Senator Plumb. He was received with applause, and his speech throughout was greeted with laughter and cheers. The Senator said that it was usually accepted as a truth that his state had been settled by New England men, and that they were the people who had braved the dangers of that period. He wished to correct the mistake. The pioneers of Kansas were from Ohio. For any one New Englander at or about Lawrence in those trying times, he had found five Ohioans. Ohio has taken possession of the West. After she had succeeded in putting things in shape out there, she would be found turning her attention to the effete East. New Yorkers would discover that next to governing themselves it would be desirable for them to be governed by Ohio men and in accordance with "the Ohio idea." Then, the Senator said, Kansas was coming East, and both Ohio and New England influence would disappear from here altogether.

Mr. Sullivan next introduced General Swayne, one of the vice-presidents of the Society, who said that this was the centennial year of the Ohio Society. The origin of the Ohio Society, he said, was in 1787, when leading officers of the Revolutionary army banded themselves together in an association for the settlement of the Ohio territory. They sent delegates to Congress and appealed to that body for the enactment of an ordinance the very language of which is now incorporated in the United States Constitution, in the XIIIth Amendment, providing that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime," should ever exist in all the Northwest Territory. As a result of this action of this Ohio Society, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Wisconsin became free states. It was the centennial of this society that was now being celebrated.

The next speaker was Mahlon Chance, who, Mr. Sullivan said, was one of the veterans present at the fall of Babylon. Mr. Chance gave a humorous historical sketch of the fall of the ancient city, at the conclusion of which the Society adjourned to view the spectacular display. A pleasant breeze made the weather on Staten Island delightful and refreshing, and the guests returned to the city highly gratified with the success of the entertainment.

At the first meeting in the fall (1887), held on September 12th, a matter of more than passing moment was taken up for consideration.

As has been shown in connection with one of the early meetings of the Society, the idea of a clubhouse, or permanent home of its own, was suggested as one of the means by which the organization could be made most effective in the service of its members. The idea had come to the front again and again in consultations among the Ohioans, and to a certain extent had been carried to realization in the temporary home now occupied on Fifth avenue. It seemed to many of the active workers that the time had now come to take steps toward the purchase or erection of a clubhouse that should be the property of the Society.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

At the meeting above mentioned this question of purchasing property for the use of the Society was presented by Judge Higley and discussed by a number of the members. A motion was made by Judge Higley that a committee of five be appointed, with instructions to take the matter into consideration. It was taken up and considered from time to time, but no action of a permanent nature resulted.

At the meeting of October 12th the president announced the following committee for the nomination of officers for the ensuing year: A. W. Follett, J. D. Gillett, H. R. Pool, Leander H. Crall, William Ford Upson, H. A. Glassford and J. W. Stout.

The chairman of the committee appointed to recommend a ticket to be voted for at the succeeding election reported, on November 14th, the following: President, Thomas Ewing; vice-presidents, Whitelaw Reid, Wager Swayne, Algernon S. Sullivan, Charles W. Moulton, George Hoadly; secretary, Homer Lee; recording secretary, John Q. Mitchell; treasurer, William Perry Fogg; members of the governing committee, Charles T. Wing, Henry K. Enos and L. C. Hopkins.

It was moved by Mr. Nye that a committee of eight be appointed to determine and report action to be taken by the Society relative to the centennial celebration of the first settlement of Ohio, to be held at Marietta, Ohio, April 6th, 7th and 8th, 1888. The motion was carried, and General Ewing, Homer Lee, W. L. Strong, Bernard Peters, Colonel Moulton, Henry Monett and Theo. S. Nye were appointed as that committee. Gen. Wager Swayne was subsequently added.

A special committee of six were appointed to make the necessary arrangements for the ladies' reception, to be held in the rooms of the Society early in December, and it was further ordered that hereafter at each monthly meeting a similar committee be appointed to arrange for a like reception on the last Monday evening of the month. Messrs. Harwood R. Pool, Marshall Halstead, Charles P. Bruch, Warren Higley, John Q. Mitchell and Theo. Ricksecker were appointed as a committee to arrange for the reception in December.

The annual meeting of 1887 was held on November 29th. The annual reports were presented and the election of officers called for. The nominees proffered by the official committee, as above given, were elected, except that William Ford Upson was made recording secretary in place of John Q. Mitchell.

While the election was in progress a committee was appointed to invite Senator John Sherman, a non-resident member of the Society, who was at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, to visit the rooms. Senator Sherman on his arrival was greeted with loud applause, and after a brief interchange of greetings with acquaintances was formally presented to the Society by Colonel William L.

Strong. The Senator made a brief speech of thanks, congratulating the Society upon its prosperous condition. As he had other engagements, he left the rooms after a brief visit.

The governing committee held its first meeting after the above election on December 3d. Nominations for chairman for the ensuing year being in order, Henry L. Burnett was unanimously chosen to preside over the committee for the next term. General Burnett stated that his business engagements would not permit his serving, and that having already devoted much valuable time to the Society, he hoped that some other member would be willing to assume the position and that he be relieved from the responsibility.

The committee were unanimous in requesting him to reconsider his decision and continue in the office. It was only after their repeated solicitations that he accepted the position again, upon consideration, however, that he would have the privilege of resigning when the Society should become an incorporated body. William Ford Upson, the recording secretary, was appointed secretary of the governing committee for the year.

It was ordered that thereafter no resignation of a member should be accepted by the governing committee until the treasurer should report, or it be otherwise ascertained, that the said member was not in arrears for the current year.

It was also decided that three members chosen from the nine members of the governing committee should be appointed a house committee. The chairman appointed the following gentlemen: Joseph Pool, A. J. C. Foyé and John Dickson.

A special meeting of the Society was held on December 6th for the purpose of taking appropriate action relative to the death of Algernon S. Sullivan, lately one of its vice-presidents. Appropriate resolutions were adopted, and speeches eulogistic of the deceased member were made. A committee of twenty-five, in addition to the officers of the Society, were appointed to represent the organization at the funeral.

When the Society assembled on December 12th, General Burnett moved

NOTE.—A pleasant comment as to the status of the Ohio Society at this date is furnished in the following from "The Earth," a New York City publication, date of December 8, 1887: "Of the eighty-eight counties of Ohio, forty-eight are represented in the Society. Cincinnati and Marietta, the oldest settlements, have the largest number of members, being 55; Cleveland comes next, with 25; Toledo, 9; Columbus, 8; Youngstown, 7; Mansfield, 6; Akron, Springfield and Mt. Vernon, 4 each; Canton, Massillon, Steubenville and Mt. Gilead, 3 each; Dayton, Urbana, Painesville, Granville, Lima, Wilmington and Zanesville, 2 each; Hamilton, Cuyahoga Falls, Chagrin Falls, Georgetown, the birthplace of Grant; Fremont, the home of Hayes; Nottingham, Lancaster, the birthplace of the Shermans and the Ewings; Ottawa, Clarksville, Chillicothe, the first seat of government; London, Tiffin, the home of Ohio's first governor; Maplewood, Norwalk, Salem, Fostoria, Oxford, Circleville, the home of the mound builders; Piqua, the camping ground of Tecumseh; Fletcher, West Jefferson, Berlin Heights, Wooster, Williamsburgh and Leesburgh, 1 each. Besides these there are others whom I cannot now locate."

that the president be requested to invite a fellow-member, Hon. S. S. Cox, to deliver an address under the auspices of the Society upon the following question: "Without reducing the internal revenue duties, can the import duties be reduced to the needs of the government economically administered without injury to the manufacturing industries of the country and to the laboring men?"

The motion was carried, and a committee of three, consisting of Henry L. Burnett, Joseph Pool and W. L. Strong, were appointed to make the necessary arrangements for this address.

THE year 1888 opened with the interest of the members in no way lessened and the fortunes of the Ohio Society of a nature to afford gratification to those who had labored so earnestly to make it what it was already becoming—a strong, prosperous and progressive organization. At the meeting of January 9th a gavel was presented by Captain Glassford. The secretary was instructed to frame and hang in the Society rooms the original paper in response to which the first meeting of the Society was called.

Mr. Howard, as secretary of the committee to fix a date for the annual banquet, reported as follows: “At a meeting of the committee appointed by the Society to determine a date whose anniversary it would be proper to celebrate in connection with its public dinners or other annual entertainments, it was resolved that this committee do hereby recommend that February 19th, when practicable—the date recognized by the United States government as that of the admission of Ohio into the Union—be fixed upon as a suitable and proper date to honor on the occasion of its annual festivals.”

After a very spirited debate, in which a number of members took part, the words, “The date recognized by the United States government as that of the admission of Ohio into the Union,” were stricken out, and it was finally resolved that the following should be adopted as a substitute for the committee’s report: “That the annual banquet of the Society shall be held, when practicable, on February 19th.”

On motion of Mr. Lake, it was ordered that a committee of eighteen be appointed to arrange for the annual banquet, whereupon the president appointed the following gentlemen: Messrs. Higley, Ewing, Strong, Smith, Reid, Lec, Swayne, Andrews, Shayne, Foyé, Rice, Milmine, Crall, Glassford, Mitchell, Lake, Wing and Moss.

The first ladies’ reception for the current year was held at the rooms of the Society on the evening of January 12, 1888. The committee of arrangements consisted of the following gentlemen: Warren Higley, Thomas Ewing, John Q. Mitchell, Charles P. Bruch, Mahlon Chance, C. C. Shayne, P. B. Armstrong, Leander H. Crall, Marshall Halstead. The programme of entertainment arranged is here given:

A comprehensive and appreciative report of the entertainment was prepared by Judge Higley, chairman of the committee of arrangements, and was submitted to the Society at a later date, and as it explains fully how successful was the affair, it is well worth presentation here:

“REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON LADIES’ RECEPTION.

“To the Hon. President and members of the Ohio Society of New York.

“Gentlemen: Your committee on the last Ladies’ Reception, held at the rooms of the Society, January 12, 1888, beg leave to report as follows: The committee were fortunate in securing the co-operation of the following ladies who kindly consented to receive on that evening, to wit: Mrs. Wallace C. Andrews, Mrs. Wager Swayne, Mrs. Warren Higley, Mrs. Christopher C. Shayne, Mrs. C. C. Galbreath, Miss Rachael Sherman, Miss Beall Ewing, Miss Strong, Miss Gillett, Miss Hutchins, Miss Vaillant and Miss Harman. The gracious welcome extended by these ladies to members and guests as they arrived at once prepared them to enter heartily into the social enjoyments of the evening, free from the cold formalities of the ultra-fashionable, meeting together with no common sentiment of interest. The thanks of the Society and especially of your committee are due to these ladies for their presence and hearty co-operation in promoting the enjoyment of all.

“Our distinguished artist-members kindly contributed beautiful works of art in oil and pastel to the number of twenty-four. These were admirably grouped by and hung under the direction of Mr. Cyrus Butler, whereby the best effects of the paintings were secured. Contributions came from the studios of James H. Beard, Franklin Tuttle, W. H. Beard, George D. M. Peixotto, J. H. Dolph, J. N. Beard, Daniel C. Beard, W. Whitridge, Mrs. Holbrook and J. Wells Champney. Taken all in all, this was the finest collection of paintings we have yet had. Our Society is especially fortunate in numbering among its members so many artists who stand in the first rank of their profession. The programme of instrumental and vocal music, of recital, address and the whistling solo was rendered to the delight of all. The artists who kindly contributed to this are Señor Ceruelos, Eugene Clarke, Miss Mandelick, Miss Julia Thomas, Mrs. D. G. Croly (Jennie June) and

Mrs. Alice J. Shaw. After the rendition of the programme an excellent collation was served by Morelli.

“That this ladies’ reception, like the former ones given by the Society, was a great success will be acknowledged by all who were present. There was a manifest freedom from restraint and a homelike intercourse not usually observed in large social gatherings, and due, no doubt, to the fact that the daughters of Ohio are as loyal as her sons, and equally zealous in honoring the state of their birth or adoption.

“The Ohio Society has stepped out of the narrow circle of prejudice and selfish exclusiveness of the club in admitting woman to social gatherings, and recognizing her as an important element in growth and strength and influence. This feature is to be commended and encouraged, and should be enlarged. It is the beginning and promise of what the modern club will be in the near future the recognition of the independence of man and woman in the social affairs of life, for—

“They rise or sink
Together, dwarfed or godlike, bond or free:
For she that out of Lethe scales with man
The shining steps of Nature, shares with man
His nights, his days, moves with him to one goal.
Stays all the fair young planet in her hands—
If she be small, slight-natured, miserable,
How shall men grow?
For woman is not undeveloped man,
But diverse: could we make her as the man
Sweet love were slain: his dearest bond is this,
Not like to like, but like in difference.
Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
Nor lose the wrestling thews that throw the world;
She mental breadth, nor fail in childward care,
Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind;
Till at the last she set herself to man,
Like perfect music unto noble words.”

A special meeting of the Society was held on January 25 (1888) to take action in honor of the memory of Col. Charles W. Moulton, one of the most prominent members of the Society; one of its most active founders and a vice-president at the time of his death. Colonel Moulton had passed away on the day preceding, January 24, 1888.

On motion of Colonel Fogg, Captain Henry A. Glassford took the chair and in a few impressive words told of the loss the Society had sustained. On motion of Colonel Lake the chair appointed the following committee to draw up a suitable expression of sorrow on this occasion: Messrs. Lake, Chance, Fogg, Guiteau and Foyé. The committee withdrew, and while they deliberated General Swayne, Mr. Shayne and Colonel Strong told of their associations with Colonel Moulton, of his many high qualities and of the deep regret at his loss. The committee reported as follows:

“WHEREAS, The members of the Ohio Society have learned with profound sorrow and regret of the death of Col. Charles W. Moulton, who was one of the earliest and most earnest founders of the Society, one of our most efficient fellow-members and a vice-president, and are desirous of expressing in suitable and fitting manner the grief and sense of bereavement felt at his loss; therefore, be it

“Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to extend in due form to the family of Colonel Moulton the heartfelt condolence of the Society, and to express to them the high esteem in which he was held by his associates for his many generous and manly qualities of head and heart; be it further “Resolved, That this testimony to his worth be spread upon the minutes and a copy be sent to his family.

“Carson Lake, Mahlon Chance, William Perry Fogg, John M. Guiteau, Andrew J. C. Foyé.”

Colonel Fogg moved that the report be adopted and spoke most feelingly of Colonel Moulton, giving personal reminiscences, especially of his connection with the foundation of the Society. Colonel Fogg said:

“I presume that no member of our Society, resident of New York, has known Colonel Moulton so long as I have. Our friendship has met the test of thirty-seven years. I first made his acquaintance in 1851, when he came to Cleveland from his home in Medina county, about twenty-one years of age, and commenced the study of law. I was three years his senior, and we were both active members of a literary club, and congeniality of taste drew us very closely together.”

Colonel Fogg then briefly sketched the career of Colonel Moulton up to the opening of the war in 1861, when he was called to fill a very difficult position under the government in Cincinnati. He stood then firm as a rock between the loyal government in its heroic struggle to save the Union and a class of unpatriotic men whose only aim was to enrich themselves from government contracts. He was directed by the war department to buy the materials and open government workshops for the manufacture of army clothing. The strongest pressure was brought from interested parties to break him down, but President Lincoln and the great war secretary stood by him, and the urgent needs of the boys in the field were supplied. Immense sums were disbursed by him, amounting to many millions per month. “What greater tribute can be paid to the integrity of Colonel Moulton than to say, as he has often told me, that when he resigned his commission at the close of the war, he was a poorer man than when he entered the army?”

“We who knew our friend who passed away so well would all bear testimony to his strict integrity of character, his keen sense of honor, and his big, generous heart. I have been called upon during the past year to mourn the loss of my two brothers, and, next to these, the man who stood nearest my heart was Colonel Moulton."

Gen. Wager Swayne was the next speaker. He said: "Gentlemen, an opportunity offers in which it becomes the duty of us all to say something of eulogy in memory of the deceased. With many sad feelings we realize that the most valuable member of the Society has been called away from us. At this moment his body is going on to its last resting place. He stands to us in the relation of a sojourner; as one of us who has left as much of himself with us as we may gather in our hearts and keep forever. It is true of him, eminently true, that he cared for us, and that his care was not merely a passing impulse. He demonstrated that his constant care was for the well being of the Society and for each one of us individually. I remember that in the course of organizing I heard him express fear that the club might be regarded as having a political significance. How well he has succeeded in making it a social organization is a matter of history."

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The proposed incorporation of the Society at about this time was taken up and the matter duly consummated. The names of the incorporators were as follows: Thomas Ewing, Warren Higley, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Henry K. Enos, William L. Strong, Calvin S. Brice, Homer Lee, John Q. Howard, John Dickson, John Q. Mitchell, Wager Swayne, Samuel Thomas, Henry L. Burnett, John H. Harman, Christopher C. Shayne, Charles T. Wing, Milton I. Southard, Benjamin LeFevre, Carson Lake, Cyrus Butler, Leander H. Crall. The constitution and by-laws were referred to a special committee, with instructions to make such changes as were needed to comply with the law. These changes and some others were duly made and the report of the committee was adopted at a meeting on March 1st.

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on April 4th, General Burnett tendered his resignation as trustee and member of the committee in these words:

"NEW YORK, March 26, 1888.

"To the Trustees and Governing Committee of the Ohio Society of New York.

"Sirs: I beg hereby to tender my resignation as trustee and member of the governing committee of the Society, to take effect immediately.

"For nearly two years and a half I have given much time and labor in discharging the duties devolving upon me as chairman of the governing committee of the old Ohio Society, now merged in the present incorporated body.

"My professional duties are of such an exacting nature, and my time so fully occupied in the discharge of those duties, I feel now that I am justified in passing the work and responsibilities connected with the governing committee of the present Society on to other members of the Society.

“Thanking my associates on the governing committee of the old Society, now constituting the governing committee of the new, for the uniform courtesy shown me as chairman of said committee, and congratulating them upon the high spirit and right thinking which seemed ever to actuate them in the discharge of their duties, I am, with sincere respect,

“Very truly yours,

The answer of the gentlemen to whom this letter was addressed was made promptly. The resignation was laid on the table and the following unanimously adopted:

“Resolved, That it is the unanimous wish of the board of trustees of the Ohio Society that General Henry L. Burnett retain his membership with the trustees, and that Messrs. Dickson and Foyé be appointed a committee to convey this wish to General Burnett.”

The committee for the third annual banquet (1888) was appointed in January, when it was expected that it would be given on Monday evening, the 20th of February—the 19th day of February having been previously fixed by the Society for its future annual banquets, excepting when this should occur, as it did that year, on Sunday, when the following day should be honored. The sudden and unexpected death of a member and vice-president, Col. Charles W. Moulton, naturally caused a postponement, and the 7th of April was decided upon as the time. Upon the card making announcement of this date were the following words:

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

FIRST SETTLEMENT

OF THE

OHIO VALLEY

April 7, 1788

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The committee was constituted as follows: Warren Higley, chairman; Thomas Ewing, William L. Strong, Wallace C. Andrews, Calvin S. Brice, A. J. C. Foyé, Henry A. Glassford, Charles T. Wing, J. O. Moss, Whitelaw Reid, Wager Swayne, Henry L. Burnett, William Henry Smith, C. C. Shayne, Carson Lake, John Q. Mitchell, George Milmine; Homer Lee, secretary; Leander H. Crall, treasurer. The work was mapped out and the chairman appointed the following sub-committees: Speakers and invitations, Thomas Ewing, Whitelaw Reid, William L. Strong, Wager Swayne, William H. Smith, C. S. Brice and Carson Lake; cards and tickets, H. A. Glassford, L. H. Crall and George Milmine; printing, Homer Lee, J. Q. Mitchell and J. O. Moss; the press, C. C. Shayne, W. C. Andrews and Henry L. Burnett; banquet, A. J. C. Foyé, C. T. Wing and Warren Higley.

The coming event was announced by the press of New York as one of importance. From the Star of April 1st we quote as follows:

“Invitations are out for the third annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York, to be held at Delmonico’s on Saturday evening, April 7th. The invitations are unique and beautiful. They are printed on a richly tinted card about four inches square, on the front of which is engraved a map of the state of Ohio in Buckeye drawing. In the centre of the map is a vignette of an early settler, a man and a dog grappling with a bear, while two Indians lurk in a background of green foliage. Over this vignette are the name of the Society and date of the banquet. The back of the card is adorned with an admirable engraved portrait of George Washington, surrounded by scroll, over and on either side of which appear Cupids holding a silken banner, on which is inscribed, ‘Ordinance of 1787.’ Below, in gold letters, are the words of Washington to his men at Valley Forge: ‘If we are overpowered we will retire to the Valley of the Ohio, and there we will be free.’ On the inside of the invitation are the names of the committee of arrangements. Among the prominent people to whom invitations have been sent are: Governor Foraker, of Ohio; ex-President Hayes, Senators Sherman, Payne, Allison, Manderson, Voorhees and Plumb, ex-Senators Thurman, Harrison and McDonald, Generals Sherman, Sheridan and Rosecrans, Associate Justice Matthews of the United States Supreme Court, the Ohio Congressional delegation, and Governor Hill of this state and Mayor Hewitt, who will represent the state and city of New York.”

The fact that the most important event in the history of Ohio and the Northwest Territory was being celebrated at Marietta, the place of the first permanent settlement north of the Ohio, prevented a number of distinguished Ohioans from being present. But for this there was reason to believe that the occasion would have been honored by the presence of ex-President Hayes, Senator John Sherman, Governor Foraker, Representative Charles H. Grosvenor and others.

CHAPTER VI

ON the night of Saturday, April 7, 1888, Delmonico's big dining-room was filled, over two hundred sitting down at the feast, which was disposed of to the accompaniment of lively music from the orchestra in the gallery and after a fashion which showed that Ohio men had extremely good appetites and presumably equally good digestions.

The affair was marked by charming informality and good fellowship. No cut and dried toast list had been prepared, so that the speakers were not under the necessity of restricting themselves to any particular text. There were five tables, but no distinctive guest-table. Its absence marked an innovation in the arrangement of dinners. The centre table was presided over by Gen. Thomas Ewing, the president of the Society. At the heads of the other tables were Stephen B. Elkins, Gen. Wager Swayne, ex-Governor Hoadly and Whitelaw Reid.

Among the distinguished guests present were Gen. W. T. Sherman, Chauncey M. Depew, ex-Secretary Windom, B. F. Jones, chairman of the Republican national committee; Gen. John S. Casement, Charles A. Dana, ex-Secretary Bristow, Cornelius N. Bliss and Col. W. L. Strong.

The banquet hall was suitably draped with the national colors, and the coat of arms of Ohio graced the wall back of the president.

The speakers proved themselves worthy of the occasion. General Ewing, Gen. W. T. Sherman, ex-Secretary of the Treasury William Windom, Whitelaw Reid, Chauncey M. Depew, Gen. Wager Swayne, ex-Governor George Hoadly, Col. C. S. Brice, Col. W. L. Strong, Charles A. Dana and others entertained those present with eloquence, and the enthusiasm with which their words were received gave unmistakable evidence of the delight of all.

When full justice had been done to the good things of the feast, General Ewing rose and after welcoming the guests he sketched in eloquent language the growth of Ohio. He was listened to with the closest attention and was frequently applauded. He spoke in part as follows:

"I bid you a cordial welcome, guests and members of the Ohio Society of New York, to our third annual banquet. If ever a people had reason to rejoice and celebrate, we Buckeyes have, on this centennial of the settlement at Marietta. For it tells of the founding of our state; of the first act of Americans in assuming dominion of the continent; of the wonderful growth of the Republic in the first century of her existence; and the splendid future which awaits her as she leads the world to freedom.

“The settlement at Marietta stands alone and without a parallel in origin and in purpose. It was not a colony of mere adventurers. It was led by no Lord Raleigh, Fairfax, Baltimore or Delaware, with vast grants of land to bestow on satellites and serfs; nor by unconquerable Roundheads, driven over stormy seas to struggle for existence on barren shores. It was a colony of American soldiers, inspired by the love of liberty regulated by law; an incarnation of the bold, virile, intelligent Americanism, born in the fires of the Revolution.

“From this initiative followed the agitations which formed and determined the character of the Republic. The liberated colonies turned from the jealousies, poverty and discouragements of the hour, and became absorbed in the inspiring problems of the future—the need of forming an effective government; defining and limiting its powers; and assuming the empire of the continent. New York generously and fraternally surrendered her claims to the Ohio country; Virginia followed; and then Massachusetts and Connecticut. The constitutional convention was called; Congress sold a million and a half acres to Putnam and his emigrant soldiers, and in the same month gave them the glorious ordinance of 1787—the first great charter of American liberty—which they bore as the Ark of the Covenant to the promised land.

“Here was the founding of the Republic. By a system of public surveys in small divisions the landlordism which blighted most of the old thirteen states was prevented and a general distribution of lands among the people forever assured—a policy which, accompanied by liberal provisions for schools and colleges, has been followed in all subsequent dispositions of the public domain, and has proved to be the fountain of general intelligence and prosperity. Slavery, then existing in a majority of the states, was forever prohibited in the Northwest, and put under the ban of American civilization. And the fundamental propositions of American liberty, which were incorporated in the ordinance of '87, and four years later adopted as amendments to the Federal Constitution, became the corner-stone of state after state as it set its star in the blue field of the Union.

“But it is not the material growth of the West, past or to come, which signalizes the event we celebrate as one of the great epochs of history. It is the fact that there was formulated and founded then a new type of government, unlike any states of the Old World, and unlike most of the just liberated states of the New World which still wore some of the tattered livery of aristocratic institutions. After a hundred years of trial this American type of state government has convinced us, and is fast convincing mankind, that the people alone have a right to rule, and are also the best rulers. The Republic formed of such states stands pre-eminent among nations in prosperity and peace, and is leading the world by its silent and shining example to the blessed consummation when every dynasty shall be dethroned, when every great army shall be disbanded, when every people shall rule themselves;

“ ‘And man to man, the world o’er, Shall brothers be, and a’ that.’ ”

Several letters of regret were then read by Judge Higley. That from Senator John Sherman was loudly cheered. It was as follows:

“ SENATE CHAMBER, WASHINGTON, April 2, 1888.

“ I have received the kind invitation of the Ohio Society of New York to attend their third annual banquet on the 7th inst., at Delmonico’s, and also the inclosed cards. I assure you it would give me great pleasure to accept this invitation, not only for the good cheer of such a meeting, but to mark my appreciation of the great event of the first settlement of the Ohio Valley, one hundred years ago. The centennial may well be celebrated with hearty rejoicings, with songs and music, and cheers by all the people of the United States, but especially by the sons of the pioneers of Ohio. To our ancestors it was the beginning of an important event in American history. It was the first outflow of population into the West and the first dedication of any portion of our territory to free institutions. It was the first proclamation of emancipation from the evils of slavery. I regret that other duties will prevent me from sharing in your happiness. But I wish you a good time and I know you will have a joyous reunion.

“ JOHN SHERMAN.”

The mention of Governor Foraker’s name was also the signal for applause. He wrote as follows:

“ MARIETTA, Ohio, April 6, 1888.

“ To the Ohio Society of New York.

“ On behalf of the people of Ohio and particularly those here assembled to celebrate the centennial anniversary of our first settlement, I send you enthusiastic greeting. While we are justly proud of our state and the conspicuous part she has borne in the achievements of the century, our hearts are filled with grateful emotions by the loving pride and kind remembrances of our absent children. May God bless and prosper the Ohio Society of New York.

“ J. B. FORAKER.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Other letters of regret were read from Congressman Charles H. Grosvenor, General Sheridan, Governor Hill, ex-Congressman Follett, Senator Allison, ex-Governor R. M. Bishop, John R. McLean, ex-Senator Harrison, of Indiana; Senator Jones, of Nevada; Congressman R. F. Kennedy and Senator Plumb, of Kansas.

It had been expected that Mayor Hewitt would be present. Judge Higley said that the Mayor had told him on Friday afternoon that if he slept well that night he would come, but he had received subsequently a letter from the Mayor regretting his inability to be present.

Judge Higley concluded by reading a poem by W. H. Venable, of Cincinnati, which contained a great many statements flattering to Ohio. Carson Lake next read a poem by Miss Bertha Monroe Wickoff on Ohio. It was well received.

The chairman then introduced General Sherman amid a salvo of cheers by referring to him as "the son of one of the earliest settlers of Ohio and the bearer of one of the most distinguished names in her civil roll." General Sherman on rising to speak was greeted with another outburst of cheering. After stating that he had not yet the honor to belong to the Society and recounting a couple of pleasant anecdotes, he said:

"My young friends from Ohio, whilst you bear your honored state in memory, honored memory, never reflect upon others. There were good men born long before there were in Ohio. There are a great many good men born in other states out of Ohio. I have encountered them everywhere on this broad continent and in Europe. There seems to be a pretty fair representation of Ohio in this great city of New York, and I claim you have the same right here as the native-born citizens, not by sufferance, but by right; and I hope you will bear in mind that you are citizens of a greater country, the United States of America. As your president has well told you in eloquent words to-night, our friends in Marietta are celebrating a past of vast importance in the history of Ohio and the United States and of all mankind. One hundred years ago there landed at Marietta that little body whose influence was then felt and is now felt all over the earth's surface; an organized body of men with discipline, seeking to make homes for themselves and their families and to rear up a state, free, where all men could enjoy liberty and the pursuit of happiness in their own way and at their own time. Ohio was the first of the states created, not the first of the thirteen, but it was the child of the Revolution, although the ordinance of 1787 preceded the constitution by two years. Yet it was made by the same men, breathing the same spirit of freedom and nationality.

"I was born in the town of Lancaster, and I doubt if any town anywhere possessed a larger measure of intelligence for its numbers, about 8,000.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

There was General Beecher, Henry Stanbury, Thomas Ewing, William Irvine. (A voice—'Tom Corwin.')

Yes; he belonged in Lebanon, and I knew him well. His name suggests to me something which I am frequently reminded of when I go to Ohio. In these modern times I don't think they're as good as they used to be in those early days. I suppose it is a common weakness with old men to view things in that way. I could recount a great many things about those early days. My memory goes back to 1826. I remember perfectly the election of General Jackson in 1828. I remember the coffin handbills put out by The Cincinnati Gazette to stigmatize Armstrong and Arbuthnot. At that time I belonged to a strict Whig family, and we all thought Jackson a tyrant. I have come to the conclusion in later years that old Jackson was a very clever fellow. There used to be a man in Columbus named Gustavus Swain, and what he didn't know about Ohio nobody did. Ohio had its fun, and its serious times, and always bore in mind that they were the first free state northwest of the Ohio. Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Minnesota followed afterward by catching the inspiration from her. It traveled beyond. I went with McCook to Arizona and found our fellows there from Yellow Creek. Everywhere we stopped we met them. They didn't know they were from Ohio, but we convinced them they were."

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Windom, the next speaker, was received with applause. He said, among other things:

"Pride is not a characteristic of Ohio by any means. Under the inspiration of this occasion I think I could express my sentiments well were it not for that peculiarly Ohio characteristic of modesty. Ohio has many things which distinguish her, her material resources, her horses and cattle and hogs and wheat and corn. And of the whiskey of Ohio we are all peculiarly proud. We are proud of her men and her women. Her sons are found upon all the fields of commerce, of war and of politics—particularly of politics. Wherever a dollar is to be honestly made, wherever an office is to be filled, you will find an Ohio man on hand. In war her sons held a front rank; and when you come to the civil offices of the country Ohio is not far behind. Of the last four Presidents Ohio has had three of them, and so far as I can see, among the names of the gentlemen who are spoken of in the party to which I belong, she has a fair chance of getting another. He would have been an Ohio man four years ago, too, almost. The gallant chieftain who led the Republican party four years ago came near it. He was born within sight of Ohio. In his early youth he breathed the inspiring air that swept Ohio's hills. Had he been on the other side of that promised land he would have been elected four years ago."

Whitelaw Reid then rose for the purpose of introducing Mr. Depew. He said in substance:

"The Ohio Society is nothing if not original. Your president seems to have the idea that the vice-president should do something. Now you have been very liberal to him, you have provided him with five vice-presidents to take the surplus work off his hands. It is a curious reversal of things which in that list makes me the senior and our venerable friend Governor Hoadly the junior. Between us is sandwiched in the only other surviving vice-president who, I fear, is not always remembered as a soldier, because of the brilliant renown he has won as a lawyer.

“Now one of these vice-presidents, as I am credibly informed, is about to explain the significance of the day we celebrate—the day that made Ohio, and so saved the country from awful trouble about finding presidents and chief justices and generals. The other, as is said on equally good authority, is going to vindicate the consistency of his own political record and that of all his associates, present and past. You see, gentlemen, there are two very long speeches before you!—mine shall be short.

“You noticed that General Ewing told us about how willing New York and other states were in Washington’s time to give up to Ohio. Well, alas, Washington is dead. They don’t seem so eager to give up to Ohio now. We are perfectly willing to let them give up. Why, we can furnish more presidential candidates to-day than half the rest of the country put together, and they’ll average pretty high, too. We can do more than that. We can furnish the only man now living, or that ever will live, that said, and meant it, that he wouldn’t have the Presidency of the United States if it were brought to him on a silver salver.

“He didn’t intend to be mean about it, either. ‘Why,’ he said, ‘if they don’t take my brother John, bless their eyes, why don’t they take my brother-in-law Tom?’ Well, gentlemen, even that doesn’t exhaust the list. Only, when you find three candidates growing in one family—like three monster ears of corn on one stalk—you begin to get some idea of the size of the Ohio crop.

“There’s been some reference to John Sherman. Nobody will question that whether for length or distinction of public service he easily leads the present list. Nobody will hesitate much in saying that just now Harrison and Allison stand next. Both are sons of Ohio; both ought to have been here tonight, and both would have been only for the secret fear of each that some incautious utterance at this critical moment might blast his boom. It is but fifty years since the grandfather of one of them was badly beaten in the race for the presidency. But he had staying powers, and four years later he made one of the most triumphant canvasses in our history, and was borne to the White House on the wave of a tremendous popular uprising.

“Ten years later the other, before leaving his native state for the wilds of Iowa, resolved to get a stamp by which he could always make good his Ohio claim, and so took his degree from the Western Reserve College.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ But I'm not going into the list of Ohio candidates. Life is short. And besides, it has always been thought that an after-dinner speech should not be too personal, and you'll bear me witness that I always try to obey that rule. I have been endeavoring by gentle stages, by mildly introducing the subject of the presidency, to lead up to the introduction of the gentleman whom I am charged by the president to introduce to you to-night as an adopted son of Ohio. I present to you this modest youth, Chauncey M. Depew.”

Mr. Depew began in a humorous vein, by acknowledging that he had no near relationship with Ohio, and that though he was on good terms with all the other great nationalities at their celebrations, when he tried to make out some claim of kinship he was at a loss for it on this occasion. He then went on to show that Ohio was “ all over everywhere,” and not only a shining example in her institutions, but somewhat of a monopolist in the possession of men fitted for high national positions. The following sketch of his remarks gives some of the points he made:

“ Ohio understands the presidential game so well that she has not only arranged it herself within her own borders, but she has studied the quality and the peculiarity of presidential lightning so as to put somebody wherever it is likely to strike. It is the peculiarity of New York that she is the most conquered city in the world. She has been successively conquered by the English, by the Yankees, by the Germans, by the Irish. But still she thought her business was secure; but when she turned to look for the money the Standard Oil of Ohio had it all, and in business, law, politics and journalism Ohio has captured New York; but then New York reveres Ohio. Ohio has always been devoted to a high order of politics. She could not have furnished chief justices, justices in the Supreme Court and presidents of the United States in such abundance except for the quality of her men and the character of her politics. The great political leaders of Ohio on all sides and in all parties have always been easily the leaders of their party upon the party thought and sentiment of the hour. Senator Sherman's fight for honest currency and Garfield's magnificent struggle for honest credit and for the purity of the government in every department of policy and finance will long be remembered as a period when it required courage, consistency and ability to stand up against the errors of the day. Among the Democratic leaders of the nation there is no one who has stood up for his convictions and compelled his party to follow him because he knew he was right—and they found he was right—so well as the old Roman, Allan G. Thurman, and that elegant gentleman, accomplished scholar and diplomat, George H. Pendleton, who taught the Democratic party the reversal of the old Jacksonian motto, that to the victor belongs the spoils, and the failure of this most beneficent reform was due to that combination of good intentions and rural inexperience as illustrated by President Cleveland, except the man comes from Ohio, which always falls a victim to the wiles of the Hungry Joe of politics.

“ We have had eight years of continuous centennials; and none of them more significant than that celebration going on to-day in Marietta, Ohio. It is more than a local celebration. It is an international celebration of the kind which affects the globe, because it affects and has affected the destiny of the human race. If every one of the hundred people who landed at Marietta a hundred years ago to-day could be a sentinel down the century, one for each year, and there could be attached to each man or each woman all that the year he or she represented meant in what Ohio was, what she has accomplished and what she is, that man and that woman would stand out conspicuously in each one of the hundred years of the century as the immortal centurions of the United States.”

The next speaker was General Wager Swayne. He was greeted with loud cheers and his speech was listened to with marked attention and abundantly applauded. This is part of what he said:

“ I suppose it would be safe to assume that 100 years ago to-night our ancestors were not dining at Delmonico's, and were not listening to Chauncey Depew. Mr. Reid has been good enough to suggest that I was not much of a lawyer because I was something of a soldier, and that I had not been a great deal of a soldier because I had been something of a lawyer. Nevertheless I propose to say something of the influence of Ohio both in the results of the war and as to her impress upon the organic law of the land. In 1783 our revolutionary ancestors were encamped at Newburgh in this state, half fed, half clothed, waiting to be disbanded. They addressed to Congress a petition asking that a tract of land, which became the Territory of Ohio, might be set apart in accordance with a previous provision of law, and in their plan of settlement they declared that in the constitution of the new State there should be a total exclusion of slavery. Out of this plan came the resolutions of 1787, which provided that within that territory from which so many States were erected, neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, should ever exist. For ten long years Indiana laid siege to Congress, asking that that clause might be repealed. John Randolph, of Roanoke, although reared in slavery, reported against the repeal. The free State of Ohio resulted, and word for word that clause was written in the Constitution also of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. In 1820 the Congress of the United States put the same clause into the Missouri Compromise.

“ In 1854 Congress repealed that clause as far as it applied to the Territories, and that repeal brought on the Civil War. But the five States, made free by the legends of Ohio, put into the war for the Union a million of men who marched and fought and gave victory to the Union. No words of mine can be appropriate when we turn to contemplate the glory of the State which shed such inestimable blessings upon all generations of men. Let us pray God that peace may be within her walls and prosperity in all her homes."

Three cheers and a tiger greeted the close of General Swayne's speech. Charles A. Dana was the next speaker. He said among other things:

"We who are not so fortunate as to have been born in Ohio feel to-night that we are praising what belongs to us, too. The glories of Ohio belong just as much to the sons of New York and Massachusetts and of South Carolina as to the sons of Ohio. Ohio is a great commonwealth; how admirable is her situation! How great is the intelligence and the industry, and above all the virtue of her people! There she stands, in the valley of that beautiful river, the centre of the continent not all belonging to the union as yet, but destined to belong to it, so that the Stars and Stripes planted in Ohio will be seen in the tropics and in the Arctic regions. The observations that we have heard here to-night, I am obliged to say, have been rather political in their tendency, and also rather Republican. (Laughter, and cries of 'Ohio is Republican!') Well, when we are in power, we all try to stay there, and when we are not in power we try to get the other party out, but there can be no party in this country that is not a patriotic party, so that while in Ohio you possess an extraordinary crop of Republican great men, men who are eminently fitted to be the candidates of that party for president, and while you have, as my friend, Mr. Depew, has said, planted a great number of them in other states, where they can be ready to take the place if those at home fail, you can't lose anything by stretching out now and then fraternal hands and adopting an outsider, and I have observed that you have a pretty warm side for our friend Chauncey, and I say you are right in it. He is one of those men of whom we all as Americans have a right to be proud. For my own part I would rather that no Republican should be elected president next year, but if there is going to be any one at all I don't know of any one that I would rather it should be than Chauncey Depew."

It was ex-Gov. George Hoadly's turn next, and that he acquitted himself to the satisfaction of everybody was attested by the applause he received. The following is a summary of what he said:

"I came here without the expectation of speaking. Twenty-four hours ago I hoped for an even greater pleasure than that of dining here to-night, for I expected to be to-night on the sacred soil of Ohio. When I came, it was to listen to him who deserves the title given him the other day by the Republicans of Vermont, the Wizard of the North, unless, indeed, Madame Diss Debar may prove her better title. I came to listen to New York's municipi-pal mayor, whom, although we have had some past differences of opinion, both he and I believe to be the best mayor in the country. I came to ask the mayor many things, and he is not here to enlighten me. I am told by my distinguished friend, who, when I last saw him, was a Democrat of the Democrats, while I was a Republican, I must speak to a text, must speak of my record. In Spanish architecture there is employed an ascending spiral, used in building stair-banisters, but the architect can never place projection opposite projection; so I find the records of myself and my friend—they won't lie spoon-fashion. Do you once think what you could have done if you had drafted the whole state in the service? You have made your presidents, your senators, your chief justices, with one hand tied behind your back, with half your population allowed only to pay taxes and do convict labor. We Democrats have been allowed to do all the fighting and heavy work, and have been defeated in elections without number, but we have always come up smiling the next day.

"Tom Corwin was once asked whether he had heard a certain story about a friend of his. 'I don't know. Was it about himself?' 'No.' 'Then I have not heard it.' So there can be no speech from me to-night unless it is personal."

After ex-Governor Hoadly, Calvin S. Brice, Attorney-General Coleman and Mr. Struss made short addresses. Then the company dispersed.

At a subsequent meeting of the Society, the committee of arrangements, in making its report as to this banquet, said:

"The committee take pleasure in calling your attention to the financial part of the banquet. A full and detailed report of the treasurer of the committee, Mr. Crall, with vouchers, is contained in the books of accounts kept for this purpose, among the records of the Society, and to which members are referred for particulars. The thanks of the committee and the Society are due to Mr. Crall for the important service he rendered in the work he has done. It is only necessary in this report to add that the gross receipts from the sale of tickets were $1,302. The total expenditures (and all bills of every kind have been paid), are $1,125.15, leaving a balance of $176.85, which the committee now pay over to the Society."

At the meeting of the Society held on May 14, signs of that reserve fund which the organization has been laying away were apparent in a report from the treasurer, showing a balance on hand of $1,743.80.

Col. W. P. Fogg presented to the Society a handsomely bound volume entitled "Charter Members," containing the original signed copies of the constitution. The gift was accepted with sincere thanks.

Colonel Fogg's letter of presentation was as follows:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“NEW YORK, April 16, 1888.

“The President of the Ohio Society.

“Dear Sir:—I have the pleasure to present to the Ohio Society the bound volume, herewith sent, containing the original signatures to the constitution of the one hundred and sixteen charter members. These include the honored names of several of our brother members who have passed away since our organization, and this volume may well be treasured among our most valued memorials.

“Very truly yours,

“WM. PERRY FOGG.”

The volume is bound in heavy morocco, with ornamentation and lettering of gold. It is eleven by eight and one-half inches in size. On the outside in gold letters are the following words:

THE OHIO SOCIETY OF

CHARTER MEMBERS.

PRESENTED BY WM. PERRY FOGG.

The book consists of various copies of the constitution of the Society, each one of which is ornamented with a handsome engraving of the seal of the state of Ohio. Every member of the list of charter members given below signed one copy of this constitution, except in several cases where two signed the same sheet, making a unique and valuable souvenir. The names are given in the following order:

At a meeting of the governing committee held on June 14, John Dickson was unanimously elected permanent chairman to succeed Henry L. Burnett, resigned.

Mr. Nye, in the session of the Society held in June, on behalf of the committee on the Ohio Centennial, reported progress and recommended that arrangements be made for an excursion of the members of the Society to attend the celebration at Marietta. The report was accepted, and the committee continued with power to act, it being understood that the Society as such should incur no expense. A. J. C. Foyé read the following letter from William Ford Upson:

“My Dear Mr. Foyé:—Will you please present the name of Ralph Hazlett Upson for membership in the Society? He was born on the 21st inst., and will, I think, make a worthy member, to judge by the strength of his lungs. I shall not be able to attend this evening, but should be greatly obliged if you will provide a big bowl of lemonade (no stick), with the young man’s compliments, charging the expense to me.

“Very truly yours,

“W. M. FORD UPSON.”

“There being no further business before the Society,” the minutes tell us, “except the drinking of the lemonade, thus generously provided for by Mr. Upson, the Society adjourned for that purpose. Whereupon, the members being gathered together fraternally with the bowl of lemonade, of generous measure, close at hand, all standing and each duly supplied with a goblet of the same, it was ordered that the following minute be spread at large upon the journal of the Society, and that a copy thereof be sent to Messrs. William F. and Ralph Hazlett Upson, viz.:

“At an informal meeting of the Ohio Society, held at the Society’s rooms, Monday evening, June 25, 1888, it was, upon motion of General Swayne, “Resolved, That Ralph Hazlett Upson be and he is hereby unanimously chosen the first member of the Ohio Society by inheritance.

“Resolved, That our congratulations are extended to his parents, with fervent trust that though he may sometimes lengthen their nights, he may never shorten their days, but make them brighter always.”*

When the sessions were resumed on September 10, 1888, it was ordered that a ladies' reception be held on the third Monday of October. Judge Higley was instructed to arrange for an informal dinner during the month. A committee of five were appointed to take charge of the ladies' reception, consisting of Messrs. Higley, Gard, Shayne, Doyle and Harbaugh.

At the meeting of October 8, by unanimous consent, at the president's suggestion, the election of the committee on nominations under the by-laws was taken up, and the following were chosen by ballot: Wm. H. Eckert, A. J. C. Foyé, J. W. Harman, Geo. B. Hibbard, Homer Lee, Dr. Zachos, B. F. Peixotto, F. C. Loveland, W. V. McCracken. On November 12 the committee on the ladies' reception reported that they were making arrangements for one to be held on the 26th inst. It was resolved, on motion of Mr. Shayne, that an engrossed copy of the original application for the incorporation of the Society be duly framed and hung in the rooms.

The gathering for the ladies was a successful reunion of the members and their friends. The full committee having the matter in charge consisted of the following: Warren Higley, Wm. L. Strong, Henry L. Burnett, Homer Lee, Calvin S. Brice, C. C. Shayne, Anson A. Gard, George Hoadly, David F. Harbaugh, Sumner T. Dunham, G. D. M. Peixotto, John Q. Mitchell, Alexander Doyle, Cary W. Moore, Marshal Halstead.

The reception committee was composed of the following ladies: Mrs. W. L. Strong, Mrs. Calvin S. Brice, Mrs. George Hoadly, Mrs. Cary W. Moore, Mrs. Mary P. Bigelow, Miss Strong, Miss Hoadly, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Frank C. Loveland, Mrs. Carson Lake, Mrs. Anson A. Gard, Miss Ewing, Miss Perry.

* Ralph H. Upson was born on June 21, 1888, and is now past seventeen years of age. He has finished a course in the high school at Glen Ridge, New Jersey, preparatory to one in mechanical engineering at Stevens Institute. His father, when the above action was called to his attention, commented upon it in these words: “As to his benefits from this membership in the Ohio Society, they are for the most part in the future. He is, I should say, in the position of one who is by infant baptism a member of the church, but has not yet reached the age of confirmation. We have preserved in the family archives for his benefit the letter of the secretary of the Society transmitting the copy of General Swayne's resolution, from which we intend, at the proper time, to claim for him all the privileges and immunities appertaining to such membership.”

It had been decided by the entertainment committee that on this occasion a formal presentation of the portrait of a great Ohioan would be made by the president, Gen. Wager Swayne.

George D. M. Peixotto, a member, had presented to the Society his painting of Morrison R. Waite, chief justice of the United States. Mr. Peixotto was a great admirer of the chief justice and decided to give a proof of that personal interest by painting a portrait of the eminent jurist for the Ohio Society. The chief justice cheerfully granted Mr. Peixotto the time required for the sittings, which were had at Washington in 1888.

Mr. Waite being engaged at that period in writing his opinion in the Bell Telephone case as well as that of the Chicago anarchists, the artist depicted him in a mood which conveys some reflection of the great responsibilities of his office.

At an appropriate moment in the evening, General Swayne, in a few well chosen words, presented the portrait to the Society in the name of the artist, and then in accepting the portrait, in the name of the Society, he referred eloquently to the high qualities of the chief justice, and in sympathetic manner commended the artist for having contributed this memorial of one of Ohio's greatest sons; a gift he described as not only a magnificent portrait but a token of the artist's patriotic feeling and true interest in the purpose of the Ohio Society. A seated figure, half length life size, the portrait represents Mr. Waite robed in the black gown of a chief justice, in one hand a vellum bound book, the other hand resting on the arm of the chair.

It was ordered at the meeting of December 10, which was the annual gathering for the election of officers, that a committee consisting of Messrs. Ewing, Caldwell and Glassford, be appointed to confer with the committee on the centennial of the inauguration of George Washington as first president of the United States, to get such information as may be necessary for the members of the Society as desire to take part in the festivities, and to report at the next regular meeting.

The report of the nominating committee having been already submitted, the Society proceeded to the election, and the following officers and trustees were chosen by ballot: President, Wager Swayne; Vice-Presidents, William L. Strong, Henry L. Burnett, Milton I. Southard, Bernard Peters, Calvin S. Brice; Secretary, Warren Higley; Recording Secretary, Charles F. Bliss; Treasurer, Leander H. Crall; Trustees, for three years, Wallace C. Andrews, S. S. Packard, C. C. Shayne; for two years, George Milmine, William S. Hawk, J. F. Holloway; for one year, A. D. Juilliard, Ralph H. Waggoner, Henry A. Glassford.

President Ewing, on retiring from the chair, and before handing the gavel to his successor, spoke as follows:

"It is three years since the Ohio Society was founded. It has not accomplished all its founders hoped for—few men hit the mark they aim at, especially if it is high. But we have gone on each year with increasing numbers and interest, and the Society to-day is stronger and more assured of permanent life than ever before.

"Much yet is needed. We want more social life. First, it seems necessary to have a good-sized, commodious and well located house of our own, or one held by a long lease at a low rent. We want it fitted up so as to be an attractive resort day and night for residents here and friends from abroad—as attractive as other club-houses of the city—not necessarily as large and elegant, but with the appointments and conveniences of an agreeable resort for ourselves and our friends.

“We want, too, much more of intellectual life. I think we should strive especially to have discussions on interesting topics of the day, as at the Twilight and other literary clubs, and also to have more of essays, the taste and spirit for having which is strong, but the willingness to prepare it not so. For instance, I am in default for a paper for two years past and my successor is, I think, somewhat derelict also.

“We were innovators in New York in establishing the first society of men from a single state. Our innovation led to the formation of the Southern Society and will lead, no doubt, to the formation of other state societies.

“Now, in both our intellectual and social aims we need the help of Ohio women in New York. We have all enjoyed the ladies’ receptions we have had, and the informal dinners. With our new house why can’t we admit women as members? Our constitution does not forbid it; it does not limit membership to men. Let us enlist their minds and hearts and graces in the intellectual and social life of the Ohio Society, and by broadening the membership we will heighten the aims and increase the good work of the Society.

“In surrendering the presidency of the Society with which I have been honored so long, I am troubled with a humbling sense in my failure to adequately exert myself for its welfare, and the grateful sense of the kindness which kept me so long at the head of the Society. I am rejoiced to know, however, that the next president will give a greater help than I have done. He has been identified with it from its birth, is zealous for its success, has high intellectual ability and sterling worth which commands the respect and admiration of every member. To his hands, now, my fellow members, I deliver the insignia of authority as president of the Ohio Society. The Society is a democracy and the president has no power vested in him except as a presiding officer. The emblems of his authority are only these two gavels, one of stainless ivory, the gift of Captain Glassford, the other, the gift of Mr. Nye, carved from a log of the double cabin in one room of which was held the first court of justice and in the other the first school in the Northwest Territory. It is of oak, which stood perhaps for centuries in the primeval forest, awaiting the coming of civilization. May it call our Society to order for a century to come, and may education and liberty, regulated by law, virtues of American civilization which it typifies, be illustrated by our Society for a century to come, and may it always be wielded by one as fit to bear it as our excellent friend and brother, General Swayne.

GENERAL WAGER SWAYNE

President from November 29, 1888, to November 29, 1891

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“And now, brethren of the Ohio Society, with grateful appreciation of the honors you have done me, I bid you farewell as your president and take my place as a worker in the ranks.”

On motion of General Burnett, it was “Resolved, That the hearty thanks of the Ohio Society are hereby tendered to the retiring officers for their devotion to the interest of the Society during the terms they have respectively served.”

At a meeting of the governing committee on the same night, Henry A. Glassford was elected chairman and C. F. Bliss secretary. A house committee of three was then elected, consisting of Alexander Doyle, Cyrus Butler and E. B. Bruch.

At the meeting of January 14, President Swayne announced the appointment of the following committees: Art and Literature Committee: John Q. A. Ward, chairman; George D. M. Peixotto, Cyrus Butler, Carson Lake and J. Q. Howard. Auditing Committee: Wm. Perry Fogg, John M. Guiteau, F. C. Loveland, Carey W. Moore and J. Q. Mitchell. Entertainment Committee: Homer Lee, chairman; Thomas Ewing, Whitelaw Reid, Jay O. Moss and Andrew J. C. Foyé.

It was announced that the fourth annual banquet of the Society would be held at Delmonico's on Tuesday evening, February 19. The following reception committee for the banquet was announced: John W. Ellis, chairman; John D. Archbold, S. D. Brewster, Watson H. Brown, H. B. Brundrett, H. H. Brockway, S. B. Elkins, Wm. W. Heaton, Colgate Hoyt, George Hoadly, E. W. Hoagland, Anson G. McCook, H. J. Morse, Chas. B. Peet, Joseph Pool, John C. Schooley, Samuel Thomas, Wm. Ford Upson, Frank Work, F. H. Wheeler.

By resolution it was decided that a committee of two should be appointed with a view to musical development in the Society.

On motion of Mr. Chance, it was ordered that a committee of five be appointed by the chair to take steps towards the entertainment of the commissioners from Ohio to attend the centennial celebration of the Washington inauguration, and to report at the next meeting.

The chair urged upon the Society the desirability of its members contributing literature relating in any way to the state of Ohio, to the library, whether as loans to be returned to the members so lending at their pleasure, or as absolute gifts.

The annual banquet was held at Delmonico's, on the evening above designated, Tuesday, February 19, 1889, when, as a local chronicler of the day* declared, “Ohio pluck, Ohio push, and Ohio perseverance were loyally celebrated.

* New York Tribune, February 20, 1889.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Rufus Putnam and the ordinance of 1787,” the writer continued, “were the themes of patriotic eulogy, and the grounds of the territory which takes its name from the river that the French called ‘beautiful’ was proclaimed with eloquence and wit.

“Although the Society is young, it makes up in enthusiasm what it lacks in age and numbers. The Ohio men are noted for coming to the front. Everybody knows that the aborigines, whose mammoth mud pies still exist, produced a superior article in mounds which defy competition. Their successors whom the intrepid La Salle encountered when he dodged his creditors and went picnicking along the Ohio, as well as the painted and befeathered hatchet throwers whom Mad Anthony Wayne subsequently dispersed, had no rivals in the fine art of hair-lifting and their stake tortures were simply unapproachable; so that the state need not apologize for the want of the picturesque and romantic in its history. Washington, it is true, lacked the address to be born on the ‘Sacred Soil,’ but the late settlement of the country must be accounted an extenuating circumstance, and if there were no Buckeyes at Valley Forge it was merely because they did not live early enough.”

The dinner arrangements were democratic in their simplicity. No raised table made the honored guests targets for the gaze of curiosity and debarred them from participation in the common mirth. President Wager Swayne’s figure graced the head of the centre table on a level with the rest of the diners, and careful scrutiny was required to pick out the features of Cornelius N. Bliss, the luxuriant locks of Roger A. Pryor, the rotund and smiling countenance of S. B. Elkins. The decorations were limited to a colored representation of the seal of Ohio, which displayed its golden sunburst above the president’s chair, and copies of the national shield which adorned the walls and the front of the building, and were draped with the Stars and Stripes.

The menu was a tastefully lithographed card, bearing on its face an outline map of the state, with a star showing the city of Marietta, and a dramatic picture of a stalwart pioneer braining a ferocious grizzly which had just feasted off the head of his favorite watch dog. A summary of the history of Ohio since the organization of the Ohio Company was contained on the inside cover, as well as a note setting up a claim to the new nickname of “The Birthday State,” on the ground that Ohio was the first state admitted into the Union after the Revolutionary war, and literally the child of the Revolution.

The compilers of this part of the document had, however, ingeniously hedged on their history by citing the several different dates which different chroniclers assigned as the period of admission and defied criticism by the triumphant announcement that "Ohio and Virginia, up to date, have furnished twelve out of the twenty-three presidents of the United States."

The invited guests were: Ex-Secretary William Windom, Senator P. B. Plumb, of Kansas; Gen. Roger A. Pryor, C. N. Bliss, and Congressmen A. C. Thompson and C. H. Grosvenor.

At about nine o'clock President Swayne rapped for order. He made no attempt at a formal speech, but congratulated the members on the agreeable occasion of the gathering, and warmly welcomed the distinguished guests. It was in New York, he reminded them, that Ohio was really born, under Virginia auspices, when in the old City hall, at the corner of Nassau and Wall streets, the Continental Congress passed the ordinance of 1787 authorizing the sale of land at the mouth of Muskingum River, out of which grew Ohio and the other states which have since clustered about her, and they might therefore recognize the peculiar fitting of such a celebration in this city.

He then read the following letters of regret, remarking that he would proceed in the inverse order of their importance:

General Schenck: "The sons of our big state may well be proud of her. Ohio by her marvelous growth and advancement has crowded ages of time within her history of less than a century. Measured by the succession of events and progress of improvement, instead of by the calendar, she now takes rank with the oldest states of the Union, and computing by the standard, I sometimes feel as if I had lived five hundred years instead of eighty since my birth in the Miami Valley."

Hon. S. S. Cox: "I am greatly concerned that I am always away when the good things are spread by my Ohio friends. As I cannot be there, the next best thing I can do is, perhaps, the best thing—to wish you all a happy evening, with much good cheer, and that every memory of Ohio may give an additional zest to the festivity."

Gen. W. S. Rosecrans: "The saying that 'blood is thicker than water,' has always been suggested to my mind since I first left Ohio for West Point, and during my four years there the sight of an Ohioan made me feel toward him as though he were a brother. The years spent in the war for the Union strengthened these feelings, and age has confirmed them."

Hon. R. B. Hayes: "Very sorry I cannot meet the 'Ohio Boys,' as Corwin called them; but some day my turn at your table will come."

Other letters were received from President Cleveland and President-Elect Benjamin Harrison; also from many other prominent men.

Simon Wolf, formerly consular agent at Alexandria, Egypt, was the first speaker called upon. He said in substance:

"New York is so much prepared for a continual dose of Chauncey Depew that no one else has a chance, so our honorable president thought to-night

he would give you the speakers, as he has the letters of regret, in the inverse order of their interest and raising the foundation of the pyramid gently to the apex. It was the ambition of my life, as a boy in Germany, to become a citizen of America, and above all, a citizen of Ohio. I succeeded in that ambition, and it has been my pride and delight to represent this country abroad, and to spread the fame of Ohio.

“Ohio men go everywhere. Who, for instance, should I knock up against in Egypt but the genial Samuel Sullivan Sunset Cox. The first thing he said to me was, ‘Old boy, here I am, where are the mummies?’ I took him to the museum of Boulak and gave him a glimpse of the mummies that had just been unearthed from the caverns of the Nile. There was a Pharaoh of the expulsion, the man who did us the great good of expelling our ancestors out of Egypt, and Sam says to me, ‘Wolf, speak to the old duffer.’ Well, not having received a classical education, I said, ‘Sam, you speak to him, as you are well versed in the dead languages.’ Being a good Ohio boy, of course, he did.

“Last year at our banquet we predicted that the United States would select its next president from Ohio. It did. We also predicted that two-thirds of the cabinet would be Ohio men. I am not going to give secrets away because I have received cipher dispatches from Indianapolis telling me not to, but I think two-thirds is about correct, and it is only one more instance that Ohio men will always prove that wherever they are, there are life, prosperity, vim and enterprise.”

The chairman next introduced A. Minor Griswold, of “Texas Siftings.” Mr. Griswold said:

“This introduction reminds me of an introduction that I received once when lecturing in a little town known as Ashtabula, on the Western ‘Preserve’ of Ohio. The president seemed to think it necessary to make an apology for having a comic lecture. He said, however, that in the formation of matter you begin with the lower order of creation. ‘Take the monkey,’ he said, ‘who gradually advanced to the higher formation of man.’ It was a pretty big audience, yet during my lecture not one of them laughed that night, but during the next day they began to snicker a little bit. I feel at all events that they are in convulsions by this time, for it is now fifteen years off.

“At this stage I am reminded of a German who came to this country, not understanding a word of English. He was in a flour mill and a barrel of flour fell upon the top of his head and injured him, as it were, in the English language. Not understanding a word of that language the man did not know that he had been hurt—if the barrel of flour had struck him in Dutch it would have killed him. Time passed and he gradually acquired a smattering of the English language, and presently his head began to hurt. At length when he began to speak English fluently he died of his ailment. I hope that fact won't befall my Ashtabula friends when they come to realize the full force of my lecture.

"Although born in New York I was a resident of Ohio for twenty-five years. I gave my best days to Ohio, and some of the most enjoyable nights I have ever spent were while I was in that blissful state. Many of you who were in that blissful state before now will know, no doubt, what I mean. I was frequently urged to go South, but I replied: 'No, I will stay with my state; nothing could persuade me to leave the state but an invasion.' I was drafted in two cities, Cleveland and Cincinnati, and there was only one thing prevented me going to the front—I was not twins.

"I gave my initial lecture in a little town called Morrow, not far from Cincinnati. I said to the brakeman, who did not know stations, 'I want to go to Morrow.' 'Why don't you wait?' says he. 'I can't, sir,' says I. 'Does this train go to Morrow?' 'No,' he said, 'it goes up to-day and comes back to-morrow.'

"I told the landlord in Morrow that I was anxious to get a start. He said they had started every lecturer so far, and he presumed there would be no exception in my case. He was right. In Cedarville, where our old friend Whitelaw Reid comes from, I also lectured. I described a painting of Joseph and his brothers, where they were putting him in a pit, not having money enough to put him in the parquet."

The chairman before introducing the next speaker took exception to the last sentence of the previous speaker. "The reason," he said, "that Joseph was put in the pit was because they had no room in the family circle."

Congressman C. H. Grosvenor was next called upon. A few of the remarks he made were:

"I only made one suggestion to the president-elect about his cabinet, which was that he should pick as many Ohio men as possible, and when his slate comes out you will probably see that the president made a note of it. Ohio keeps her eye on whoever is born in the state. She keeps a register of Ohio men, and whether they go West, over the Rocky Mountains and down across the Pacific Coast, or whether they go to New York, or become famous at the bar, on the bench, or in the halls of legislation, Ohio keeps her eye on them.

"What a magnificent spectacle we have in this recent presidential election. An Ohio born man gracefully, triumphantly elected president of the United States. Ohio man gracefully, smilingly, magnificently making a fight to beat the others, and say after the fight that he was at any rate glad that he was an Ohio man who won. Underlying the growth of Ohio is the great fact that she built her institutions on a solid basis of freedom and liberty; liberty of conscience.

“Principles underlying our organic structure, that religion, morality and education are essential to the growth and perpetuity of the state, are the great things that Ohio built upon. Those great principles were carried to us engrafted in our organic law by the men of New England.”

With a graceful allusion to the early settlement of Ohio by New England people, the chairman called upon Cornelius N. Bliss, president of the New England Society. Mr. Bliss said:

“Mr. President and Gentlemen:—I shall make no apology for a single word that I may say, for I came here with the understanding that I should not be called upon to say a word. The witty words that I have heard uttered here to-night by Ohio men make me wish that I, too, had been born in Ohio and always stayed there.

“I wish to say a word to you, however, that in view of the kind words that you have spoken concerning the New England Society, it greets you with pride and gratification. We thank you and are glad that you remember the old home. It is with great pleasure that I extend to you the right hand of fellowship—with the same pleasure I did the same for the new Southern Society. It seems to me all these societies are calculated to do great good in our country. I believe that the good that can be accomplished by them will be incalculable. Let’s hold together until we bring this city and this state and this nation into one harmonious whole. Gentlemen, I thank you for your kind attention.”

Congressman A. C. Thompson followed with a brief but happy speech.

Hon. Roger A. Pryor spoke next, making an eloquent and historical speech. He said in part:

“May I, gentlemen, now that Virginia has fallen from her high estate, pause a moment with reminiscences? Who was it but Patrick Henry, of Virginia, that offered the resolution in the Continental Congress for the breaking away from England? And who but Thomas Jefferson that drafted the immortal Declaration of Independence? George Rogers Clark, under the direction of Patrick Henry, organized the expedition that went to the West and wrested the state of Ohio from the British. In 1784, when our forefathers were endeavoring to form the Confederation, it was objected to on the ground that Virginia was such a large territory, and Virginia magnanimously surrendered the magnificent territory of Ohio.

“But when it was feared that the government of the old Confederation was too weak to stand, Virginia, through the immortal George Washington, recommended the call of a convention, and the result of that convention was the written constitution that is the basis of our government to-day. It was a Virginian who on the fields of Lundy's Lane and Chippewa vindicated the strength of the American army. In 1861, when the Civil War threatened the existence of the Union, Virginia dispatches messengers to Washington to urge moderation, and when the first shot was fired on Fort Sumter, Virginia in her convention voted two to one against secession. But when the conflict became inevitable Virginia said, 'I am of the South and I will fight with my state,' although she knew at the time that she would have to bare her breast and take the brunt of the battle.

"After this narration, has any one a word to say against old Virginia? What has Virginia done since the war? There is not a man in Virginia to-day that would, if he could, reshackle the slaves who have been emancipated. We have come back, or, rather, we have been brought back, into the Union and we are here to stay, and don't you forget it! Do not confound Virginia, I implore you, with other Southern states. Virginia looks to an indestructible Union, of indestructible states."

Ex-Secretary Windom was greeted with prolonged cheering when he rose in response to the president's call. It was some minutes before the enthusiasm of the audience subsided, and when it did his remarks were singularly apt and graceful. He said in substance:

"I want first to congratulate this Society on the splendid success of this entertainment. If I had come here to-night with any purpose of making a speech I should now be very glad to refrain from doing so, for after the speeches we have heard the attempt would be a greater task than I can perform. However, I have congratulated myself very much since I sat here to-night upon my great wisdom and good luck. In the first place I congratulated myself on my wisdom in being born in the great state of Ohio.

"I listened to my distinguished friend who paid so glowing a tribute to old Virginia, and remarked, too, that nearly thirty years ago two such mere youths as he and I represented our respective states on the floor of Congress, and have scarcely seen him since, and am happy to meet him to-night. I congratulate myself on my wisdom, good judgment and good luck in having both father and mother born in the state of Virginia; then again turning to our distinguished friend, president of the New England Society, I congratulate myself more than in all other respects upon my very good wisdom and my extreme good luck in getting a wife from New England.

"Now, gentlemen, can you get up a better combination than that? There is but one thing that I can add to it to give you a further idea of my great good luck and judgment—that was, perhaps, in removing from Ohio to the great state of Minnesota, the queen of the head of the Mississippi River. We are all proud of our native state. I am especially proud of Ohio. I am proud of the combinations who have been represented here to-night, of the glories which are visible all about her, and the halo of glory in being descended from Virginia, as it is, in having such a great mother as our friend has told us of in New England. There is no reason why Ohio should not be great, and she is, and patriotic besides. You may go where you will on this great earth, and if there is a dollar to be honestly made, or an office to be honestly filled, Ohio is ready to make it or fill it. I believe it is reported that General Garfield once said that he never could look upon a boy without taking off his hat when he remembered the responsibilities buttoned up in his coat. He was speaking of Ohio boys, without doubt.

“I have been making a little calculation as I sat here. There are about two hundred and forty Ohio men in this room, everyone of whom could make a better speech than I could, and if each one takes one minute—it is eleven o'clock now—it will be fifteen o'clock before we get through, I therefore shall not take up the time of any Ohio men any longer.”

As Mr. Windom resumed his seat he was again loudly cheered. Maj.-Gen. O. O. Howard was the next speaker. In the course of a short but interesting address he said:

“If I am at the base of the pyramid I must occupy a very thin place. I have listened to speeches that made me wish that I was like the speakers and not like a simple soldier. I have listened to the speeches and I have rejoiced that I was here. I was telegraphed to come and I came. I cannot make much of a speech. I was born in Maine. I have been in Ohio where I have seen the little children strewing flowers in the way of the soldiers returning from the war.

“But my mind has run back to Maine to-night where I was born, on a bleak hill. I have traveled in the Old World and I have returned to the United States to rejoice that I was born here. It is a good country to be born in and it is a good country to return to. I looked about to-night when I came in and said to myself, ‘What a fine set of men—these men born in Ohio.’ I rejoice in the principles that have been taught me in my youth and for which I have stood up and am willing to stand up.”

President Swayne then bade the gentlemen good night, and the annual dinner came to an end.

CHAPTER VII

AT the meeting of the governing committee on March 4th, on motion of Mr. Holloway, the following declaration, prepared by General Swaync, was directed to be presented to the Society at its next regular meeting, and to be embodied in the chairman's report of the governing committee, to-wit:

"The governing committee having been instructed to consider and report upon several constitutional amendments looking to the extension in various directions of the field of membership, and changing in some particulars the amounts payable by members, respectfully report that in their judgment the Society at this time would be more benefited by stability and permanence in both those features of its character, than by any present change.

"At the same time the committee recognizes and appreciates the desire and need of a larger place for the social element in the Society's affairs. They beg to suggest, therefore, that the full time of one evening in each month is not required for the Society's current business, and suggest the propriety of occasionally giving notices that at the next regular meeting the regular order of business will be dispensed with and the evening given in charge of the entertainment committee, who will provide appropriate and interesting features, and that ladies and other guests of members will be welcome. The committee, if authorized by the Society, will give such notice whenever in their judgment the Society's current business will permit.

"The committee recognizes also the desirability of purchasing works of art, whenever such a purchase will not only be desirable in itself, but will also secure to the Society a valuable member. They are advised, however, by the experience of other associations that life-memberships are apt to give rise to very inconvenient and difficult situations. The result in their judgment is that a simple authorization to them to occasionally purchase works of art and give in payment therefor receipts for initiation fees and for dues paid in advance for not exceeding, say, five years, would best accomplish what is desired, and they recommend that such authority be given."

This report was presented to the Society on March 11th, and on motion of Mr. Butler was adopted.

The report of the entertainment committee upon the fourth annual banquet was submitted by Mr. Crall, showing receipts from tickets sold to be $1,377.00; disbursements amounting to $1,104.03, and a surplus to be paid into the treasury of $272.97. The report was adopted. The thanks of the Society were also tendered to the members of the banquet committee.

General Burnett moved that at the next monthly meeting the regular order of business be omitted and the evening be given in charge of the entertainment committee, which was to provide appropriate and interesting entertainment which ladies might attend. Carried. General Burnett moved that the governing committee be authorized to purchase works of art for the Society, and to give therefor receipts for initiation fees and dues not exceeding five years. This was also carried.

A valuable and interesting paper was read before the Society on April 8th by Gen. Henry L. Burnett, on "Our Military and Naval Establishments. The Armaments of the Great Powers. Our Defenseless Coasts." It was listened to with great interest, and on motion of General Ewing was ordered printed at the expense of the Society.

At the meeting of the governing committee on April 20th it was decided to decorate the Society building during the centennial exercises and to provide a platform at the front, from which members and their families could view the parade. Steps were taken to entertain the commission from Ohio while in the city.

On June 10th Captain Glassford, on behalf of the governing committee, read a report stating among other things that the Society was in a prosperous and improving condition; that its funds had been husbanded to the utmost extent, and that its finances were in excellent condition, the balance of cash on hand at the time of the report being $2,790.57, and that all debts had been paid.

The committee on entertainment of the commissioners from Ohio to attend the centennial celebration of the first inauguration of Washington reported through Mr. Caldwell that they had met the commissioners; had extended to them the privilege of the Society rooms, and had given them entertainment of a private character. The report was accepted.

The president reported that he had been invited to meet the general committee of the World's Exposition of 1892; and, on motion, it was resolved that he represent the Society in said committee.

The first meeting of the fall was held on September 12, 1889, for the purpose of taking appropriate action relative to the death of the Hon. Samuel S. Cox. A committee appointed to draft a series of resolutions reported, and the same were adopted. A number of members were appointed a committee to attend the funeral.

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on October 7th, a communication was received from Ralph H. Waggoner, accompanied by a certificate of the Ohio Auxiliary of the World's Exposition at Chicago, urging the coöperation of Ohioans in furthering the interest of Chicago in that direction. General Swayne addressed the committee requesting that action be taken in favor of New York city as the site of the fair. The following preamble and resolution was offered by him: "In view of the appointment of our president on the general committee of the World's Exposition of 1892, it is Resolved, That the committee pledges itself to the president's support and will promptly carry out his suggestions or those of the general committee." This was seconded by Mr. Milmine and carried.

Judge Higley moved that a series of entertainments be given during the coming winter season to consist, first, of an address by the president on a subject of interest to Ohioans which he might select; secondly, of an informal dinner; thirdly, a ladies' reception with luncheon, followed by a dance; and fourthly, about the holiday time, to consist of musical entertainment and dance. The report was adopted.

The chair then called for the election of a committee to recommend members for the offices to be filled at the annual election to be held in November. The following gentlemen were chosen as members of the nominating committee: Messrs. Holloway, Chance, Stout, Upson, Butler, Sisson and Loveland.

Ex-Gov. George Hoadly, of Ohio, was then presented to the Society by the chair; delivered a eulogy upon the late Samuel S. Cox, and referred to his early life and training and subsequent career as a statesman.

Mr. Crall, on behalf of Mr. Schuckers, the author, presented the Society with a life of Chief Justice Chase; also a portrait of Gen. William Henry Harrison. The gifts were accepted and the secretary instructed to return the thanks of the Society for the same.

The nominating committee reported through Mr. Chance, chairman, the following ticket to be balloted for at the annual meeting on the 29th inst., to-wit: President, Wager Swayne; Vice-Presidents, William L. Strong, Henry L. Burnett, Calvin S. Brice, Henry A. Glassford, John W. Harman; Secretary, Warren Higley; Recording Secretary, Edward B. Bruch; Treasurer, Leander H. Crall; for Trustees for three years, Benjamin F. Peixotto, William H. Caldwell, Carson Lake.

The annual meeting for 1889 was held on November 29. The report presented by the governing committee was as follows:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen:—Your governing committee begs to respectfully submit the following report: Much of their attention has been given to your expressed wish for a permanent home, and in conjunction with your building committee two efforts were made. One contemplated a purchase, the other a leasehold. Both failed of success, and the plan of conducting the Society on a club basis has for the present, at least, been left in abeyance on the recommendation contained in the special report of the building committee recently adopted.

“The lease of the rooms now occupied by the Society expires April 30th next, and steps should be taken at the proper time towards its renewal or the procurement of other quarters. On this point it is recommended that the Society should seek other apartments at a lower rental, where its meetings may be held and its property be protected, such as may be found on some of the streets between Fifth and Sixth avenues, and that a hall be engaged for entertainments for and as the occasion may require. Your committee thinks a saving in expenses may thus be made and the financial and social interests of the Society be better promoted.

“The arrangement for the partial use of these rooms by the Republican Men’s Association was fairly profitable while it lasted, but under the contract it was terminable on notice. Such notice was given by the association and their occupancy closed June 30, 1889. It was not renewed, as was expected.

“The president, General Swayne, was invited by the chairman of the general committee of the World’s Fair of 1892 (Mayor Grant) to a place on the committee as a member representing this Society, and your governing committee thereupon pledged to him its prompt support of his recommendations and those of said general committee.

“The Society mourns the loss by death of three of its members during the past year: Merrill H. Gillett, S. S. Cox and Henry Beard. The Society has adopted in due form the proper and customary resolutions of condolence in relation to the first two; as to the latter, the usual action will doubtless be taken; and while on this subject, your governing committee would respectfully suggest that uniformity and simplicity in the method and style of the publication of obituary resolutions might with advantage be adopted, so that members of the Society, as well as the families of the deceased, may be put in possession of the reports of obituary committees. The usage of Loyal Legion in this regard is recommended for adoption—special report attached.

“Your efficient treasurer will in his report furnish particulars of the membership of the Society and of the financial condition, anything thereon from this committee would, therefore, be superfluous.

“The foregoing committee are largely indebted to the house committee for their valuable and indefatigable services during the entire year.

“A. D. Juilliard, Ralph H. Waggoner and Henry A. Glassford retire from this committee on the election of their successors—they are not eligible for reelection.

“Respectfully submitted,

“HENRY A. GLASSFORD, Chairman.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The report of Leander H. Crall, treasurer, was presented and ordered received, as was also that of the entertainment committee. The Society then proceeded to ballot for the candidates for the officers for the ensuing year. The gentlemen proposed by the nominating committee, as already given, were all elected, with the exception of trustees; George E. Armstrong and John Dickson being chosen in place of Benjamin F. Peixotto and Carson Lake.

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on December 2d, S. S. Packard was unanimously elected chairman of the committee for the ensuing year. The house committee, consisting of Cyrus Butler, Alexander Doyle and Edward B. Bruch, was reappointed.

The December meeting of the Society was held on the 9th, when the president announced the appointment of the following standing committees: Entertainment: Homer Lee, R. H. Waggoner, A. J. C. Foyé, Benjamin F. Peixotto, Benjamin Le Fevre; Literature and Art: Alexander Doyle, F. C. Loveland, Mahlon Chance, John M. Guiteau, Cyrus Butler; Auditing: Charles B. Peet, P. B. Armstrong, John W. Stout, John T. Granger, M. B. Wright; Library: Theodore Nyc, J. S. Moulton, C. E. Milmine.

William Henry Smith, one of the Society's members, read an interesting and historical paper, at the close of which the president expressed the thanks of the Society for the entertainment. After the formal meeting adjourned, refreshments were served, and several gentlemen rendered instrumental and vocal music.

The fifth annual banquet was given at Delmonico's on the evening of Wednesday, February 19, 1890. The arrangements were in the hands of the entertainment committee of the Society, which was constituted as follows: Homer Lee, chairman; Benj. Le Fevre, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Ralph H. Waggoner, B. F. Peixotto. The reception committee consisted of the following gentlemen: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; Gen. W. T. Sherman, Thomas A. Edison, George L. Pease, Lowell M. Palmer, Calvin S. Brice, A. W. Follett, Chas. H. Zinn, George B. Hibbard, Charles Sprague, William L. Strong, John D. Archbold, Cary W. Moore, W. C. Andrews, A. L. Bennett, H. H. Hobbs, Thomas Ewing, Geo. E. Milmine, John W. Stout.

The great hall of Delmonico's was decorated with American flags, and blazoned on the walls was the following record: "Our Generals: Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, McPherson; our Presidents: W. H. Harrison, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, B. Harrison; our Pioneers: Putnam, Washington, St. Clair."

"In looking at the great names which Ohio so worthily claims," said Mr. Depew in the course of his speech, "I find, on a cursory examination, that Grant is counted twice. How many more are similarly honored I do not know; but I believe that one of the current questions of Ohio is an honest ballot box!"

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The members and guests sat at five tables. There was no dais, all being "tables of honor." At the head of the centre one sat Gen. Wager Swayne, the toastmaster, and at the foot sat Judge Warren Higley. At the right of General Swayne sat Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, and at his left Hon. John S. Wise. At the next table Gen. Thomas Ewing sat at the head and H. A. Glassford at the foot. At the next, S. B. Elkins and John W. Harman; at another, William L. Strong and S. S. Packard; and at the last, Hon. Calvin S. Brice and Simon Wolf. At the right of General Ewing sat Gen. W. T. Sherman.

The menu card was artistic. On an outer page it bore the sign of "The Bunch of Grapes Tavern," with the couplet:

One of sour, two of sweet,
Four of strong, and eight of weak.

Within was the bill of fare, and a series of quotations having reference to the "Bunch of Grapes" and its associations. These were as follows:

"OHIO.

"A Tavern Chair is the throne of human felicity."

"There is no private house in which people can enjoy themselves so well as at a capital tavern."

"First mention of the Bunch of Grapes, 1711:

"Mr. Francis Holmes be allowed eight pounds in consideration of a house of his in King street (Boston), being pulled down to stop ye fire."

"Bunch of Grapes diary, 1712:

"Deputies treat the Governor at Homes's * * *"

"I invited the Governor to dine at Homes'."

"Dine at Holm's. I supposed the Council had treated the Gov'r, but the Gov'r would pay * * *"

"Friday I treat the Gov'r at Homes, had two dishes of green pease. Party of eleven in all, paid 36s."

"The first meeting for the organization of Trinity Church was held in the Bunch of Grapes."

"The Boston Massacre took place almost before its very door."

"Washington's stay at the Bunch of Grapes upon his coming to town after the evacuation of the British."

"1733. 'The foundation for the first Grand Lodge of Free accepted Masons in America was laid in the Bunch of Grapes tavern.'"

"Lafayette was entertained at the 'Bunch of Grapes.'"

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ ‘The Boston Tea Party was organized at a meeting held at the Bunch of Grapes.’

“ ‘The first meeting for organization of the Ohio Company was held at the Court Chamber of Bunch of Grapes Tavern. From this feeble beginning has sprung one of the richest, most populous and powerful states in our Union.’

“ O-O-OHI-O.”

The entertainment committee introduced something new, strange and pleasing into the proceedings. Gen. W. T. Sherman was one of the speakers. Before he spoke, there were thrown on a white screen, by the stereopticon, portraits of General Grant, General Sheridan and General Sherman. The orchestra played “Rally Round the Flag, Boys,” “The Star-Spangled Banner,” and “Marching Through Georgia.”

Homer Lee read letters and telegrams of regret from Whitelaw Reid, John Q. A. Brackett, Thomas N. Hart, Mayor of Boston; A. Miner Griswold, Gov. James E. Campbell, of Ohio; Senator John Sherman, and John L. Cooper, of Chicago.

Mr. Reid sent the following dispatch to General Swayne:

“Most cordial greetings in answer to your letter and sincere regrets for necessary absence. You have learned to appreciate Ohio more than ever since you came to New York. Come abroad and you will be still prouder of your whole country, and especially of that fairest spot in it, the spot where we were born.”

Governor Campbell wrote:

“Upon my return from Washington I find an engagement previously made with the Columbus Board of Trade for the 18th, and learn that there is no train by which I could reach New York in time to participate in the Ohio Society’s banquet, very much to my regret. I send the state flag, however, and hope you will have a royal good time.”

Senator Sherman’s letter, dated February 6, ran as follows:

“I regret to say that I shall not be able to attend the annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York on the 19th inst. I have agreed to dine with General Sherman on his seventieth birthday on the 8th inst. in New York, and will probably not be able to go there again during the present winter.”

General Swayne, as usual, made an excellent presiding officer. His preliminary remarks were witty and able, and he introduced the speakers with tact and grace.

The first speaker was Gen. Thomas Ewing, who delivered an eloquent address, of which the following is a part:

“The Ohio Society is founded to help preserve, interpret and hand down the traditions of the most beneficent, peaceful event in American history, excepting only the Declaration of Independence. But for the movement of the old soldiers of the Revolution in their last encampment at Newburg and the legislation they procured from the Continental Congress and their settlement at Marietta, the Northwest would probably have been still held by the British. Tennessee and Kentucky were threatening to cut loose from the Colonies, which were wrangling, disunited, penniless and powerless. It is not too much to say that our republic owes largely to that company its continental expansion, its free institutions, the arrest of slavery and its subsequent overthrow and destruction, and the development of that enlightened and progressive spirit of liberty which has placed it foremost in the majestic march of civilization."

Mr. Wise reminded the Buckeyes, in charming phrases and well-chosen words, of the ties that exist between their state and "Old Virginia, mother of states." Ohio, he said, was born, indeed, under a lucky star. He prayed that the active life of Virginia was not past, but that she was only recuperating for new effort. If, however, her days of glory were passed, she had always the old proud feeling of failing womanhood amid age and decrepitude, that of maternity, in that she had seven times reproduced her species. He continued: "The word of the message I bring you from old Virginia is, 'God be praised for Ohio's past; God be blessed for Ohio's present; God grant that her future may be the full and free fruition of what the present and the past give promise! If it is, Virginia, her mother, feels that her cup of happiness is full.'"

General Swayne introduced Hon. Chauncey M. Depew with reminiscences of Mr. Depew's Yale life, when he was known by the prophetic name of "Chat Depew." Mr. Depew, after several quips and modern instances having more or less reference to Ohio, compared the children of Ohio and the children of New York in respect of politics. New York citizens, he complained, were stanch in politics, except on an occasion that was before the eyes of the whole world, and then New York saw politics as in everything else. Said he:

"Nobody is to blame for this condition of things but ourselves. Public affairs have to be managed, parties have to be managed, and if the people don't do it they will be managed by gentlemen who have an interest in public affairs and naturally become leaders. Now in Ohio how different it is! There every man, every woman and every child takes politics in with their mothers' milk. The first question which an Ohio man brings before you is either the tariff or its opposite. You never can discuss a professional question, a business question, or the promotion of a railway or a company or working a mine; you never can discuss an enterprise to build up a Western state, with an Ohio man, but what he takes a recess for politics. Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar. Scratch an Ohio man, whether he have the cloth of a Bishop or the everyday suit of a railroad man, and he's after an office!"

The chairman, introducing General Sherman, said:

"There are three species of generals: The little general, who is desirous only of fame; the other general who is ambitious of opportunity and willing to risk danger in his desire for distinction and regard; and the greatest general of all, he whose heart is in his country and whose country is in his heart; and for such a one the country can not do too much. The military commander of that character in this particular instance is the impersonation of Ohio, Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman."

Prolonged cheering greeted the introduction of the renowned leader and patriot, and as he got up and before he began to speak the warm greeting was repeated. He said in part:

"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen:—I have sometimes thought that we attach more importance to the place of our birth than it is really entitled to. I was there myself—in Ohio, I mean—but still I have no memory of my birth. I am told that I was born there, but that's all I know about it—I mean in Lancaster, Ohio. I do believe that in the place of our birth the mind and the character of manhood begin to form very early in life; when the mountains, the woods and the streams that flow by your house all become stamped upon your memory and form part of yourselves. It is chiefly the men and women with whom you associate in early life who have the greatest influence in the formation and making permanent of what your character shall afterward be. I recall my own early days in Lancaster, Ohio, as vividly as I look upon your faces now. I thought, for example, Napoleon was a very small soldier when compared with old General Beecher. And I remember William and Christopher King and old 'Bill' King. Of the great men among whom my early days were cast, 'the noblest Roman of them all' was Thomas Ewing. A better, nobler, more intellectual man never lived than Thomas Ewing of Ohio. I really think I received the inspiration of my life from an inferior class of men, if it is a fact that I received it from men other than those whom I can recall as having been associated with me in the days of my youth.

"In those parts was the home of Phil. Sheridan. His parents were purely Irish, and they claim now to have been born in Albany. Well, I have nothing to say against that, but it is certain that Phil. was brought up in Ohio. These associations and places were the schools in which we were taught. They were good schools, better schools than you have in New York to-day. Five dollars a quarter was the fee, and this included Greek and Latin, and all the sciences, as well as reading and writing. That's rarely taught nowadays. Sheridan was pure Irish and I pure Yankee-Scotch and Yankee; and in the course of events each of us had to play important parts in the great effort to preserve the integrity of the Republic, by virtue of which we are free citizens."

At the close of General Sherman's speech Mr. Depew jumped to his feet and cried: "Three cheers for that which best represents what Ohio is, has been, and can be." The cheers were given with a will.

Professor Harper, of Yale College, next spoke, and was followed by Senator Calvin S. Brice, who spoke briefly. He said:

"The reason Ohio men seek office is because they value the good opinion of their neighbors, and if a man fails in obtaining that he fails in what he sought and his hopes are not realized. The reason I entered the contest was because my neighbors in my town and county wished me, and I succeeded. It is the little country colleges in states like Ohio where the fibre of young men is toughened for the battle of life, and we should keep these colleges by sending them both pupils and money."

General James M. Ashley also spoke. It was late when the diners left the hall.

A special meeting of the Society was held on February 28th, and a letter was read from Hon. John B. Mosby, mayor of Cincinnati, addressed to the Hon. George Hoadly, of New York, in reference to the memorial service to the Hon. George H. Pendleton, late ex-senator of Ohio. An invitation was extended to Governor Hoadly to be present, and the letter of Mayor Mosby continued as follows:

"The remains are now on their way to this country on the ship of war Enterprise, and on her arrival at your port we will announce the day for the ceremonies here. It is also our desire that the Ohio Club of New York shall at once appoint a committee to receive the remains at New York, and if possible accompany them at least as far as the Ohio line, where you will be met by a committee of the Ohio legislature, who will assist you as an escort to this city. Will it be too much to ask you to at once call your Society together and make such arrangements as you think proper under the circumstances, and post me at once as to your own acceptance, as well as the action of your Society?"

"We also desire you, as a member of our committee, to send a formal and written invitation to his excellency ex-President Cleveland to be present at the ceremonies here."

The following committee were appointed to wait upon Frank K. Pendleton, the son of the late George H. Pendleton, at No. 44 Broadway, to consult with him with reference to the foregoing request, and to render such service as might be found to be appropriate: Hon. George Hoadly, Hon. Calvin S. Brice, Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Thomas Ewing, Hon. Milton I. Southard, Gen. Henry L. Burnett and Hon. Warren Higley.

At the meeting of March 10th Mr. Lee presented a report from the entainment committee upon the recent banquet showing that the bills had been paid and a surplus of $263.81 left in the hands of the entertainment committee. The committee were authorized to retain and spend this sum for the benefit of the Society.

Colonel Strong was called upon, and delivered an interesting speech. General Burnett was requested to deliver an address at the next regular meeting of the Society. Mr. Nye offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

“Resolved, That the governing committee be instructed to consider the advisability and feasibility of having the proceedings of the Society stenographically reported; and if, in their judgment, it shall not involve too great an expense, they are hereby authorized and directed to make proper provision for such verbatim reports of future proceedings of the Society.” T. T. Eckert, Jr., gave an exhibition of the phonograph.

In the meeting of the governing committee held on March 24th the following resolution was adopted:

“Resolved, That the matter to be published in the pamphlet authorized by this committee at its last meeting be confined to the dates of organization and incorporation, present officers, constitution and by-laws, roll of membership and roll of the dead.”

In the meeting of the Society on March 10th, the proceedings of which are above given, it is stated in the terse language of the recording secretary that Col. William L. Strong made a speech. There was present as a guest on that occasion an Ohioan newly arrived in New York, who set down and published * his impressions of the gathering. It has been thought permissible to make the letter a part of this record, as indicating the spirit of these gatherings, and as showing the calibre and methods of the eminent Ohioans who then had the fortunes of the Ohio Society of New York in charge. It is as follows:

“The Buckeye who has a spare evening in New York that happens to be coincident with the monthly meeting of the Ohio Society of New York can afford to omit his usual visit to the theatre and send in his card at No. 236 Fifth avenue.

“The regular monthly meeting, whether held in rain or shine, in mud or snow, is sure to call out three or four dozen at least, mostly of elderly ex-Ohioans, who have come to depend upon these gatherings as upon a love feast, from which they could not bear to be excluded. A half-hour is spent in handshaking and gossip, when the formal call to order is given. Generally the veteran and venerable Gen. Wager Swayne is in the chair; a man who needs no introduction to the generation of Ohioans now coming on the stage, and certainly none to that which is passing away. A happier presiding officer could not be constructed out of the best parliamentary materials of the universe. He is not only at ease, but master of the situation, knowing when to accelerate business, and when to let it follow its own meandering course; when to throw a dam across the stream of a too profuse eloquence, and when to clear out the channel of too trivial talk. He knows when there can be speech-making with profit, and whom to call out, and when one has spoken upon one theme and is to be followed by some one else upon another.

“General Swayne knows how to weave in a few happy words, that dovetail the one into the other, and make a social mosaic of the whole. He is a combination in that regard of Harvey Rice and Henry B. Payne. No man has the past of Ohio more in mind and regards it with a more tender veneration. When the General and some of the older members get fairly started in an informal way upon reminiscences pertaining to their home state it becomes a symposium of Ohioana full of golden gems of history and biography that, if gathered up and preserved, would become of rare historic value.

“At a recent gathering, when General Swayne was absent, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, once of Cincinnati, was compelled to preside, being one of the vice-presidents. Although not possessing the experience of his honored chief, General Burnett proved himself master of the situation, and was as happy in his selection of speakers as General Swayne could have been. William L. Strong had been upon an extended tour of the South, and after some persuasion was set upon his feet and delivered a speech that was as full of humor as it was of good sense and information. But, remembering that he was there in the capacity of an Ohio man, and not as a great American traveler or political economist, Mr. Strong led himself around to his experiences when he was a general merchant in Mansfield and Loudonville, back in these days when there were no railroads, no money, no markets and a great deal of bartering and ‘getting stuck’ on wildcat money. He recalled the time when he sent flour from Mansfield to Cleveland by wagon at a cost of fifty cents a barrel, and threw in the parenthetical information that it could now be shipped from Minneapolis to Liverpool for twenty-eight cents; told of trades of home-made flannel of Richland county production for patent medicine warranted to ‘down’ the fever and ague natural to the bottoms of the Black and the Sandusky rivers, and of various mercantile transactions native to the Ohio of near half a century ago.

“The venerable John W. Harman, once of Canal Dover, but for many years a New Yorker, followed with a few anecdotes of his early personal interviews with Abraham Lincoln. A. M. Jones talked for a time of wonders of Idaho, and told of the Ohio men he found in every direction; J. F. Holloway related an anecdote, and a son of General Eckert gave an interesting exhibition upon a phonograph. Then came a light lunch and more conversation."

On April 14th Mr. Waggoner read a letter from P. F. Collier, publisher of Once a Week, presenting to the Society a portrait of General W. T. Sherman. A letter from General Sherman regarding the same was also read. The thanks of the Society were duly tendered to Mr. Collier for his gift.

The president introduced Mahlon Chance, who read an able and interesting paper upon the question of the date of Ohio's admission into the Union as a state, at the close of which it was unanimously resolved that the thanks of the Society be tendered Mr. Chance.

CHAPTER VIII

IN the meetings of the governing committee and Society on May 12th the house committee was authorized to close the rooms on Sundays of the coming summer if they thought it wise, and were directed to look about for another available place for the use of the Society. An interesting paper on "My Recollections of Ohio" was read by S. S. Packard. At the June gathering Treasurer L. H. Crall reported that the Society had a balance of $2,200 on hand and all debts paid. An interesting address was delivered by Wallace C. Andrews.

The first meeting of the fall was held on September 8th. President Swayne delivered an address upon "The Ordinance of 1787," and the thanks of the Society were tendered by formal vote, and it was ordered that the address be published. An interesting musical programme was rendered under the direction of Eugene Clarke. On October 13th the following gentlemen were elected members of the nominating committee to select officers for the ensuing year: John Dickson, S. S. Packard, Cyrus Butler, H. K. Enos, Cary W. Moore, Dr. J. S. Converse, John W. Stout.

J. F. Holloway read a paper entitled "The Story of an Ohio Boy Who Became an Engineer."

At the meeting of November 10th President Swayne addressed the Society upon the recent celebration at Gallipolis, Ohio, for which a vote of thanks of the Society was tendered. The committee on nomination made the following report: President, Wager Swayne; vice-presidents, William L. Strong, C. N. Hoagland, J. Q. A. Ward, Thomas A. Edison, George Milmine; secretary, Warren Higley; recording secretary, Edward B. Bruch; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees for three years, A. J. C. Foyé, E. C. Bodman, Charles B. Peet.

The annual meeting of the Society was held at the Hotel Imperial on November 29th, preceded by a dinner, at which eighty-five members were present. President Swayne was in the chair. The report of the governing committee was read by its chairman, S. S. Packard. It was so replete with information, and suggested so much for the good of the organization, that it was ordered printed in pamphlet form, and is here given in full:

"The governing committee of the Ohio Society of New York would respectfully report that during the fiscal year just ended they have held eleven regular meetings, with an average attendance of seven members, five being a quorum. At the first meeting in December, S. S. Packard was chosen chairman and the following members reappointed as house committee: Cyrus Butler, Alexander Doyle and Edward B. Bruch. A resolution was also passed to hold the meetings of the committee hereafter on the second Monday of each month, before each regular monthly meeting of the Society. At the monthly meeting of the Society, held on January 13, a lunch was served at the conclusion, which seemed so appropriate and hospitable that the practice has been uniformly observed at all the subsequent meetings. The matter of expense for this part of the entertainment was duly considered by the committee, and it was felt that as the comfort of members was one of the chief considerations of the Society, the experiment should be fairly tried. The average cost of the nine collations which have been served is $28.44. In fact, including this outlay, the average monthly expenses of the Society, as shown in the treasurer's statement, have not exceeded the average of former years.

“The renewal of the lease of the present rooms was made, after full consideration, and with the approval of the Society. The failure of the efforts to secure a permanent home for the Society seemed to settle the policy as to its future character, of a society rather than a club, and the reaction developed a strong tendency on the part of some thoughtful members to do away altogether with a permanent home, and keep the Society together by monthly meetings, after the manner of some of the church clubs or of the Twilight club. It was felt that the main rallying point would always be the yearly banquet, which had already achieved an enviable place in the public esteem from the high character of the speakers and the general interest felt in the historical importance of the state. Another argument against keeping up the form of a club lay in the fact that those members who were of the clubable kind had already their affiliations with regular clubs where the attractions were greater than they were ever likely to be in a club which should grow out of the Ohio Society. Besides, the Ohio Society was now, and was likely to remain, greatly a society of families, and the tendency already shown to encourage the presence of ladies at the general meetings was sure to increase rather than diminish.

“The president of the Society, as well as some of the prominent members, had shown from the beginning a desire to bring forward for discussion Ohio topics, and members were encouraged to prepare papers touching various points of interest centered in the state. At the regular meeting in January, William Henry Smith read a thoughtful, historical paper which called forth the strongest expressions of approval. This was followed in the February meeting by a characteristic talk from the president on the ‘Early Days of the City of Columbus.’ This talk elicited much pleasant discussion, from which cropped out personal reminiscences such as induced the president to attempt to work that field for future entertainment. General Ewing and General Burnett were placed on the list and are held for future papers, and Thomas Edison had an opportunity to decline. The failure to secure regular papers at once, and the interesting talks that sprang up without formal preparation, suggested to certain members the feasibility of employing a verbatim reporter in order to secure for the archives of the Society the many delightful things which fell from witty and modest members, destined otherwise to be lost. Although this policy did not prevail, the president did not permit himself to grow discouraged, but worked arduously along the line he had laid down. And he was richly rewarded in securing a carefully prepared paper at the April meeting from Mahlon Chance on the admission of Ohio into the Union. At the May meeting Mr. Packard read a paper covering his recollections of Ohio, which was ordered printed; and at the June meeting Mr. Andrews gave an interesting talk on Youngstown and the growth of the iron interests in the Mahoning Valley. For the September meeting, the President was induced to give his estimate of the importance of the Ordinance of 1787, which he did under the title of 'The Legend of the Northwest Territory.' To this meeting ladies were invited, and the very generous response to the invitation at once satisfied the members that the key to the future of the Society had been struck. And in another direction the wisdom of the new departure became manifest; 'The Legend of the Northwest,' as presented by the speaker, was found to so aptly emphasize the work of the Society in maintaining the historical importance of the state, that there was a great unanimity of expression in the matter, and the president was urged to continue in his efforts. A further impetus was given at the next monthly meeting when Mr. Holloway read to a large assemblage of men and women a paper on 'How an Ohio Boy Became an Engineer,' which proved to be a graphic account of his own boyhood struggles and the condition and development of the northeastern portion of the state during the past fifty years. The president then began to reach out for material of the same sort, and has secured the coöperation and promise of a number of eminent Ohio men who can be relied upon in the not distant future to entertain the Society. Meantime, not to disappoint the Society for the November meeting, he gave from his own careful study of the question the true significance of the recent centennial gathering at Gallipolis. The continued increase of attendance on the part of the ladies has been one of the encouraging incidents of this departure, and leaves no doubt as to the feeling upon the subject. It is proper to state that at these meetings, besides the paper and the refreshments, we have, under the procurement and direction of Mr. Eugene Clark, been favored with excellent diversions in the way of music and recitations. There is a general acquiescence in the development of the Society along these lines, and in view of the fact that there is such a breadth of talent to be made available, it has been thought that it would be well not to confine the speakers too closely to Ohio topics. Ohio men are themselves Ohio topics, and anything they may choose to say will be accepted as a development of the state through its eminent and honored citizens.

“The question of extending the area of membership so as to include residents of the states contained in the original Northwest Territory is still an open question, and by a resolution passed at the regular meeting in May the discussion and final action is set for this evening. A part of the resolution, however, provided that thirty days’ notice be given in advance, which requirement, I think, has not been met. It might be well, nevertheless, in the remarks made by members on this occasion to keep this suggestion in view.

“The members of the governing committee have not failed to see the importance of some well-defined policy for the future guidance of the Society. They are alive to the fact that in itself Ohio is a great state, even without including the other states embraced in the Northwest Territory, and the recent establishment of an Ohio Society in Chicago, which they are assured had nothing to do with the prospective offices soon to be doled by the World’s Fair Commissioners, as an indication that the Ohio idea is susceptible of expansion as well as of condensation. And while there may be warrant for extending the area of membership in the existence of the New England Society and the Southern Society, the recent establishment in this city of a Delaware Society shows how dear to the heart is the name and fame of the state. Whether this state pride may not be preserved even should the Society take on a secondary title of ‘The Northwest Territory,’ members must decide for themselves.

“The Ohio Society is already an established fact; it is on record in a way to admit of no diminishing consideration. It must grow larger, and not smaller. It must hold a greater and not a less place in the recognition and life of the metropolis. There should be attracted to it more young men, and they should have a hand in shaping its future. It should be so embalmed in our affections and our memory that its life and its interests will be promoted and guarded as we promote and guard the interests of our own families. At present there seem to be good reasons for retaining a home, especially as by sharing the rental with other organizations we may bring our expenses readily within our means. This keeping of a home will be necessary if it is ever thought best to collect and preserve books, pictures and other mementoes of the state. And while it is, for the present, at least, established that we do not desire a club, there are indications that a general meeting room for members is a comfortable thought, if not a necessary adjunct to our permanent growth. The report of the treasurer will disclose the fact that we are not growing rapidly in numbers and neither are we falling off. The same is true as to our financial condition.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

We can safely say that we are on a sound basis. It is quite evident, however, that there has been during the past year no great zest in adding to our numbers; and the governing committee in canvassing this fact have felt that it would not be out of the way to urge upon members, while accepting the admonition for themselves, a little more active interest in this direction. A very little effort on the part of each member would double our numbers and put us in a much better condition to carry forward whatever policy might be deemed best.

“On the whole, the governing committee feel that some progress has been made. The treasurer’s report as to the growth of the Society will be found encouraging. Of the vacancies by death, that of General Peixotto appealed with special force to the Society, as he was a most active and intelligent member and in many ways a man of mark. A special meeting was called on September 20, and suitable resolutions passed and proper respects paid to his memory, and a committee appointed to attend the funeral. Proper recognition was also given to the removal of the remains of Hon. George H. Pendleton from Germany to his Cincinnati home, and, at the request of the mayor of Cincinnati, a committee was appointed to receive the body on its arrival in New York and to facilitate its removal to Cincinnati. The committee comprised Hon. George Hoadly, Hon. Calvin S. Brice, Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Thomas Ewing, Hon. Milton I. Southard, Gen. Henry L. Burnett and Warren Higley.

“In conclusion, the committee would congratulate the Society, at the close of its fourth year, upon the satisfactory work accomplished, and the greater and better work which lies before it. The work of the past has necessarily been pioneer work, and its merit lies in the clearness with which it points out the path for the future. No organization can or should live that has not in it the promise and potency of good, and no social organization can establish itself in a great metropolitan city that does not appeal to the highest social interests and satisfy the best social demands. It must not only meet these requirements, but it must offer substantial returns for the fealty without which it cannot live.

“Ohio is a talismanic word. Its very euphony charms the ear and captures the imagination, while its associations answer the most exacting requirements of history, sentiment and poetry. The place held by the grand old state in the movement which culminated in a country free from the blight of human slavery, and her geographical position as the keystone of the arch of our confederation, conspire to dignify and bless the work committed to us. But all these considerations and impulses cannot of themselves build up an Ohio Society. That can be done only through labor guided by wisdom and sanctified by unselfishness.

“S. S. PACKARD, Chairman Governing Committee.”

The report of Leander H. Crall, treasurer, was presented, showing a balance on hand of $1,951.80.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The report of the entertainment committee was read as follows :

“NEW YORK, November 29, 1890.

“To the President and Members of the Ohio Society.

“The entertainment committee takes much pleasure in stating that the fifth annual banquet, which was held on the 19th day of February (one of our seven birthdays), at Delmonico's, and sometimes called the ‘Bunch of Grapes Tavern’ dinner, was even a greater success than any of its predecessors. As this banquet was held during the Lenten season, the committee had many apprehensions as to its success, but were agreeably surprised at the attendance, as 225 members and guests were present. After clearing up, the committee found itself burdened with a surplus of something like $300, which worried us a little, so it was decided to work it off by giving the ladies a reception, which was held on the 30th of April at the Hotel Brunswick. Although the occasion was one on the eve of moving day, it did not prevent a large attendance, and was greatly enjoyed by everybody.

“In addition to the above, nine collations were given during the year, at our regular monthly meetings, at the rooms of the Society to which ladies were invited. The result of this experiment has been most gratifying, not only to the committee, but we believe to the Society in general. The entertainment committee begs to thank the president of the Society and a number of its members for their hearty coöperation in every suggestion that has been made, also Mr. R. M. Walters for so kindly placing a piano in our rooms, and to Mr. Eugene Clarke for supervision of our music programmes. This is the first occasion where a dinner has been given at our annual meeting, and the attendance to-night vouchsafes a repetition in the future. Mr. Keech, our new member from Seneca county, and his partner, Mr. Stafford, whose only fault is that he was not born in the United States—of Ohio, deserves the thanks of the Society. When the committee first applied to Mr. Keech he said his house was not big enough, but told us he would cut a door and make it larger, which he did. For a hotel with such hospitable proprietors, decorated as it is to-night by such a cluster of Ohio beauties, and built as it is upon a rock and of Ohio stone, should be a thing of substantial beauty and a joy forever.

“HOMER LEE, Chairman Entertainment Committee.”

The Society then proceeded with the annual election of officers, and the gentlemen above named were declared elected for the ensuing year.

Addresses were made by a number of members, and Eugene Clark favored the Society with a tenor solo. The meeting closed with a verse of “Auld Lang Syne,” in which all joined.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The standing committees for the ensuing year were later announced by the president as follows: Literature and Art: D. C. Beard, Alexander Doyle, John M. Guiteau, F. C. Loveland, Franklin Tuttle; Entertainment: Homer Lee, George Scott, M. I. Southard, Wm. Ford Upson, R. H. Waggoner; Auditing: Mahlon Chance, H. A. Glassford, John T. Granger, J. W. Stout, M. B. Wright; Library: H. L. Burnett, chairman; C. F. Bliss, C. E. Milmine. At a meeting held on December 8th Bernard Peters delivered an address entitled "Reminiscences of Ohio." In the governing committee, on the same evening, Mr. Packard was unanimously chosen chairman for the ensuing year. He was authorized to order the publication of two hundred and fifty copies of the constitution and by-laws, with a corrected list of officers and members and a roll of the dead. When the same body met on January 12, 1891, it was ordered that the house committee consist of members of the governing committee. The three newly elected members of the governing committee, Messrs. Bodman, Foyé and Peet, were appointed a house committee. In the Society meeting on the same night the regular order of business was dispensed with, and the president introduced the Rev. Dr. Henry M. MacCracken, who delivered an address upon "The Scotch-Irish in Ohio and other States and Territories." A musical programme was rendered, followed by a collation.

A special meeting was held on January 30th for the purpose of giving suitable expression of sorrow on the sudden death of the late secretary of the treasury, Hon. William Windom, who was born in Ohio and had taken a deep interest in the Ohio Society. Resolutions were adopted in honor of his memory and a committee appointed to attend his funeral.

The sixth annual banquet of the Society was an affair of rare enjoyment, although not so marked in its characteristics as some that had preceded it, and as others that have followed. The date was February 6, 1891, and the place was Delmonico's.

The details were in the hands of the regular entertainment committee, constituted as follows: Homer Lee, chairman; George Scott, Hon. Milton I. Southard, Wm. Ford Upson and R. H. Waggoner; and they were ably assisted by Andrew J. C. Foyé. On the reception committee were: Col. William L. Strong, chairman; John D. Archbold, C. N. Hoagland, Albert W. Green, Frank M. Gillett, H. L. French, John A. Smith, T. D. Critten, Charles B. Peet, George P. Tangeman, Henry K. Enos, S. B. Elkins, H. A. Glassford, Curtis H. Harraman, S. D. Brewster, Mahlon Chance, D. Pritchard, H. L. Burnett and Frederick C. Train.

The story of the banquet as told at the time by a newspaper chronicler,*

* New York Tribune, Saturday, February 7, 1891.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

was prefaced by these appreciative words: "It is popularly believed in Ohio that the site of the Garden of Eden is in Ohio. It is popularly believed in Ohio that if Goldsmith's citizen of the world had had his own way, he would have surrendered his nomad note-taking career, and would have been a citizen of Ohio. It is popularly believed in Ohio that the hub of the universe is in the centre of the state. It is popularly believed in Ohio that the millennium will begin there. All these beliefs had their earnest expounders last evening at the sixth annual dinner of the Ohio Society of New York. The motto of Ohio is 'imperium in imperio,' an empire in an empire. The annual reunion of the exiles of Ohio in New York was a dinner of dinners.

"The enthusiasm of the Buckeye boys who crowded the principal room of Delmonico's was all but roof-raising. It certainly made the walls ring. A real Ohio cheer is something worth hearing, and when heard will never be forgotten. The principal cause of the enthusiasm was Ohio. A supplementary one of high degree was the presentation to the Society, by J. Q. A. Ward, the well-known sculptor, of an old oil-picture of William Henry Harrison, the log-cabin and cider-barrel Ohio president of the United States. This portrait was painted by a celebrated French artist about the time of the birth of Benjamin Harrison."

On the face of the menu card was a representation of the old swinging sign of the Bunch of Grapes Tavern in Boston. On the next page was a beautiful engraving of George Washington, who was a surveyor in Ohio before the Revolution. Above his picture was the motto, "Great Buckeyes from Little Grapevines Grow," and below it, in golden letters, was the following quotation: "If we are overpowered, we will retire to the Valley of the Ohio, and there we will be free."—Washington at Valley Forge.

On the back of the menu card was a picture of the first log cabin built at Marietta, in 1786, and nailed to the cabin door, "The same old coonskin," where it was hung up to dry. The wine card was printed in gold and blue, and on the back of it was engraved a map of Ohio.

Each guest found beside his plate, in addition to these handsome card souvenirs, two real buckeyes with little printed pasters on them, telling the uninitiated that they were "Fer rheumatiz."

The Ohio men sat in the most democratic and brotherly fashion possible at five parallel tables running almost the entire length of the dining-room. The tables were alphabetically named, and at the head of C, the middle one, sat Gen. Wager Swayne, the president of the Society, while opposite him at the foot of the table was Stephen B. Elkins. At table B, on the right of the presidents, H. L. Burnett presided at one end and Charles B. Peet at the other. At the head of table D, to the left of the president's, was Col. William L.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Strong, and at the other end was Milton I. Southard. George Milmine had the presiding place at one end of table A, and ex-Judge Warren Higley sat at the other. At table E, J. Q. A. Ward and Gen. Thomas Ewing faced each other from the ends.

Letters of regret were received from many men who had been invited to attend and who could not be present. President Harrison wrote:

“EXECUTIVE MANSION,
“WASHINGTON, January 26, 1891.

“Mr. Homer Lee, New York City.

“My Dear Sir:—I beg to acknowledge the invitation, which you conveyed orally on behalf of the Ohio Society of New York, to its annual banquet on the 6th of February, and to say that it will be impossible for me to leave Washington on any social errand while Congress is in session. I recall with great pleasure the evening I spent with your Society two or three years ago, and would have been glad if the circumstances had been favorable to renew that pleasant experience. With the best wishes for the success of your Society, I am very respectfully yours,

“BENJ. HARRISON.”

Letters were also read from John Sherman, Grover Cleveland, James Whitcomb Riley, Murat Halstead, Gov. William E. Russell, of Massachusetts; J. M. Rusk, Secretary of Agriculture; W. S. Rosecrans, Calvin S. Brice, S. L. Clemens, better known as “Mark Twain”; Chauncey M. Depew, Gen. R. A. Alger and others.

Gen. Wager Swayne, in his introductory speech, told, for the benefit of the people present who did not know it, if there were any such, and to the delight of those who knew all about it, the origin and history of Ohio's emblem, the buckeye. Continuing, he said:

“When Ohio began making presidents, she put in nomination William Henry Harrison. Some little great man of that day remarked, ‘Why, Harrison is more fit to sit in a log cabin and sip hard cider than to rule in the White House of Washington.’ The people of Ohio wanted no better challenge than that. They covered Ohio with log cabins, each one with a barrel of hard cider at the door, and strings of buckeyes hanging up, and they asked in verse the question:

‘Oh, what, tell me what,
Shall be your cabin's fate?’

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ And the answer was :

‘ We’ll send it on to Washington,
And set it up in state,
As a token and a sign
For the noble Buckeye state.’

“ We have special cause to bring that to mind to-night. In the foremost place among the artists of this city we are glad to recognize one of our vice-presidents, J. Q. A. Ward. This night out of the fulness of his heart he has presented to the Ohio Society of New York the best extant contemporaneous portrait of the greatest Buckeye of all, William Henry Harrison.”

The picture was held up to view in the music gallery and there was tremendous cheering, followed by three cheers for Mr. Ward. Then President Swayne introduced Gov. James E. Campbell, whose rising was the signal for fresh cheering.

Governor Campbell made a speech picturesque by reason of its versatility. He would be a well versed Ohioan, indeed, who could name a topic connected with the state on which the Governor did not touch. He said many witty things, some of them inspired by the friendly fire of comment which attended his remarks. He was never found wanting. For instance, he said: “ I see before me many men who, both in peace and war, added to the glory of Ohio before they saw fit to shake the dust of it off their feet. I don’t know exactly what you say to each other when you meet upon these occasions.”

An Ohioan voice—“ Take a drink.”

The Governor—“ I accept the proposition,” and he did.

Governor Campbell went on to claim for Ohio about everything in the heavens above, the earth beneath and the waters under the earth; and this he did keeping his countenance admirably grave amid the laughter which his cool, calm, take-it-for-granted manner evoked. He did not forget, with all the fun and jollity, to pay an eloquent tribute to Ohio, spoken seriously and oratorically, which was received with tremendous cheering.

The next speaker was ex-Governor Lounsbury, of Connecticut, who thinks a good deal of the Nutmeg state, and who didn’t allow the “ O-O-Ohioans ” to forget it. He was received with much applause, and by what he said awakened much responsive cheering and laughter. Part of it was as follows:

“ Mr. President and Gentlemen:—I am not one of the three contending governors of the state of Connecticut; I am simply an ex-governor. I received a few days ago an invitation from your worthy president to be present upon this occasion, and as a slight consideration for the evening’s entertainment, he would deem it a marked kindness if I would say a few words concerning the relationship of Ohio to Connecticut. Not long since a distinguished statesman of Ohio said in my presence that he had often wondered how in the world it was that this country managed to get along during the time when there was no Ohio. I wonder how such a man of intelligence could have wondered. The reason the United States got along before the existence of Ohio was simply because Connecticut was to the fore. The next best thing to being the son of Connecticut is to be her grandson, a son of Ohio. And if I could not have been born in the Nutmeg state, better known as the land of steady habits, and could have been consulted as to where the event should have occurred, I would unhesitatingly have chosen the Buckeye state. And if any one ever expects or dreams of desiring political preferment, Ohio first and every time.

“You are doubtless aware that your ancestors from Connecticut were a modest, generous, unselfish, peace-loving people, but whenever they were called upon to maintain what was righteous, like yourselves, they have never yielded. As I have said, it is because the earlier settlers of Connecticut were a generous and unselfish people, that is the reason, and the only reason, why the place in which I am now standing is not in the state of Connecticut instead of the state of New York. The territory of colonial Connecticut extended to the great waters of the West. Whether those waters were the Hudson River or the Pacific Ocean the historians have failed to tell us. Peace-loving Connecticut gave to her more ambitious sister all that she asked. Hence this is the city of New York. Grateful, indeed, are we that we had territory enough left out of which sprang a race of stalwart men, whose sons leaped across the state of New York and founded a new Connecticut in the state of Ohio.

“Virginia, Massachusetts and Connecticut! Why this should be the order in which you name your parents I cannot comprehend, unless it be on account of your Sriptural education, which taught you that the first should be last and the last first. Connecticut has no reason to complain of the generous welcome her sons have always received from the hands of Ohio, and with the joy that springs from this is mingled admiration for Ohio’s homes, her fertile fields and her unexampled prosperity. We in the East have seen your star and rejoice to know that from the first you have nurtured that redeeming principle of liberty that has filled the land from ocean to ocean and become the hope of the whole western world.

“It is right that Ohio should feel a noble pride in her grand success. But she must not forget the tribute of gratitude that she owes to her parent states. That desire for bettering one’s condition which is so God-given that it lies at the root of liberty—that, indeed, you caught up from your grand-sires who braved the storms of the Atlantic and from your fathers who trod the path of the wilderness. You have made the fair face of your state to blossom like a rose, and in the vast fields beyond your borders you have carried and planted successfully the seeds of your success; for have you not inherited that indomitable pluck and sublime endurance that surmounted every obstacle? When the people of New England entered into the field of action they found freedom an accomplished fact, and in the glad knowledge that slavery had not poisoned the life-blood of their state, they sought not to enter where its malaria had been destroyed in the light of conscience or the winds that come down from the mountain peaks of eternal wrath. God creates freedom and not slavery. And in the light of this knowledge our brethren from the South now grasp our hands.

“With eyes no longer looking reproach, we gaze upon the fields of the future. It is folly to ignore the logic of the century and childish to forget the lessons of the conflict. We cannot safely ignore the teachings of the past, whether they have been written in the lessons of our own experience or that of some less fortunate sister state. Not by generous blood, nor cordial manners, nor charm of culture, but in righteousness, is a nation exalted.

“We want protection to the citizen, to his life, his labor, his liberty. It is an eternal law for all the nations that for every injustice there must be full expiation. No state can be so stable in its position or so firm in its strength that it can afford to overlook or to forget to right the wrongs of the humblest and the lowest class of its citizens.

“I am one of the few New Englanders who cannot trace their lineage to William the Conqueror. Ohio! You do well to honor your ancestors. It was upon their virtues that the great state of Ohio was built up, and it is by the inspiration of their example that it must be preserved.”

Hon. Leroy D. Thoman, who was the president of the Ohio Society of Chicago, spoke like a good Chicago man, as well as a genuine “Buckeye,” because when he didn’t praise his native state he “boomed” the World’s Fair. He said in part:

“There may not be much of New York in Ohio, but there is a wonderful sight of Ohio in New York. I think it is a beautiful tribute to the character of the fathers and the mothers who were the early settlers in Ohio that their sons and their grandsons are brought back to New England and the seaboard, to mingle in and to become part of the great interests for which this portion of our common country is conspicuous. Wherever you find activity, enterprise, pluck and steady development you find an Ohio man. The Ohio Society of Chicago will be only one year old next April, and yet I could recite the names of many prominent men connected with it, whose birthplace was Ohio, that would make you feel proud of the progress we have made out West in that line, as well as in all other lines. Governor Campbell says that he came six hundred miles to be present at this dinner. With the same object in view, I have traversed the continent to the extent of one thousand miles."

Attorney General David K. Watson was introduced as a typical representative and champion of the legal fraternity of Ohio. He said:

"Not expecting to be called on to-night, I am, Mr. President, embarrassed by the situation. For I assure you I can be embarrassed, even if I came but yesterday from Ohio. I do not propose to eulogize Ohio, for, like Massachusetts of old, she needs no eulogy. But I may be pardoned if I speak in terms of praise of some of the men whom Ohio has produced in my own profession. In doing so I must refer first to him who was first and foremost, Mr. Chairman, him who was the highest up—your own great father. For profound and comprehensive knowledge of the principles of law no man was more eminent than Thomas Hewitt. In the analysis and application of those principles Henry Stanbury is the peer of any. Ohio has produced statesmen as broad as any in the world. She started out to capture the nations of the earth with her great men and she has done it. You will pardon the remark, and Governor Campbell will swear to it, that out in Ohio we feel that we govern this republic. We have not only furnished presidents, but we have more yet to furnish and you will hear from them before long." (Cheers, and cries of "Campbell.")

Clark Bell, the president of the Saturday Night Club, bespoke New York City's welcome to Ohioans. Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, of Brooklyn, as the representative of the Ohioans in Brooklyn, was received with round on round of cheers. He closed his address with a touching and eloquent tribute to Secretary Windom, which the Society, rising, applauded to the echo. Gen. Henry L. Burnett spoke the last words as a representative of the Ohio Society, and the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" by the entire assemblage closed the evening's programme.

At the meeting of February 9th, Hon. Abner C. Thomas, a member of the New York bar, delivered an address on "Ohio as Viewed by an Outsider." A programme of music was then presented.

A memorial meeting in honor of Gen. William T. Sherman, who had passed away, was held at the rooms of the Society on February 17, 1891. The renowned soldier had been an honorary member of the organization. The rooms were filled with members, and deep feeling was exhibited. The following gentlemen were appointed a committee for the preparation of resolutions expressive of the Society's sorrow and sympathy: S. S. Packard, Warren Higley, Henry A. Glassford, T. M. Guiteau, Ralph H. Waggoner. The resolutions presented were unanimously adopted, as follows:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

A number of eloquent and heartfelt speeches were made. John M. Guiteau spoke of General Sherman as one of the saviors of the country, to whose genius and patriotism we are indebted for our liberties and our greatness as a nation more than to any man living.

President Swayne pointed out how thoroughly were joined in the life of General Sherman two family currents of influence that went to make up the greatness of the state of Ohio, the Shermans and the Ewings.

General Swayne then referred to Sherman's life and services at some length. He had enjoyed for years an intimacy with the great general, and the number of men who had enjoyed such intimacy was one of the surprising features of a wonderful life. At his death it became plain with regard to many men that each had supposed himself to be perhaps the most intimate friend of Sherman. The truth was that the General's great wealth of affection and of sympathetic interest had enabled him to lavish upon each of many men what it would have required the whole breast of another man to supply. The range of his acquaintance was equally remarkable. A short time since he had shown to the speaker twelve large volumes, bound and indexed, of letters received from friends. The writers were in every field of science, literature and life. A publisher had offered $50,000 for them, but of course the offer was only amusing to the General. The varied occupations of the writers indicated the breadth of General Sherman's sympathies—as broad as humanity itself.

Col. L. M. Dayton, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who was adjutant-general of the army of Sherman on his march to the sea, said he had been closely associated with General Sherman for eight years, the most eventful of the republic. He said: "I knew the General intimately, served with him as his chief of staff during the most exciting strain he probably ever had in his eventful life. He followed to the end as cheerfully and as courageously as any man ever did his work. With all his sternness and possible severity, a tenderer and kinder heart no man ever possessed. He was the best man that I ever knew."

The resolutions adopted on that occasion were by order of the Society engraved in a most artistic manner and published in a small monograph, which also contained the remarks above quoted and the speech delivered by General Sherman at the banquet of the Ohio Society at Delmonico's, on February 20, 1890, which has been already quoted. On the outside of this small book appeared the one word, "Sherman," while the title page was as follows: "Tribute of the Ohio Society of New York to the memory of Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman, February 17, 1891."

The governing committee, at the meeting of March 9th, ordered that the names of the following Ohioans be placed upon the roll of honorary membership, the requirements of the by-laws having been complied with in each case: Benjamin Harrison, Allen G. Thurman, James E. Campbell.

General Burnett appeared before the committee and on behalf of the library committee requested, first, that a correct list of the books now in the Society's library be prepared for the information of the library committee; second, that from three to five hundred copies of said list be printed; and, third, that means be provided for keeping the books of the library under lock, and that the removal of books from the Society's rooms be prohibited. The subject was referred to the house committee with power. When the Society met on the same evening the president announced the unavoidable absence of Hon. J. M. Ashley, who was to have read a paper, and called upon General Burnett, Hon. Mahlon Chance and Professor Packard, who each favored the Society with a short address, after which there was the usual musical entertainment. The letters that follow were received, at a later date, in acceptance of the election to honorary membership above noted:

“EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, April 10, 1891.

“Gen. Wager Swayne, New York City.

“My Dear General:—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th inst., advising me that I have been enrolled as an honorary member of the Ohio Society of New York. Please express to your associates my appreciation of the honor they have done me, and say to them that I accept with gratification this evidence of their esteem.

“Very truly yours,

“BENJ. HARRISON.”

“STATE OF OHIO, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
COLUMBUS, April 10, 1891.

“My Dear General:—I cannot too cordially express the pleasure with which I accept the honor conferred upon me by the Ohio Society of New York. I beg to assure you, and through you the Society, that I esteem it one of the chief gratifications of my life to have received this mark of respect and kindness from my former fellow citizens now in the great metropolis. Will you do me the kindness to convey to the members of the Society, in your own happy manner, my high appreciation of their courtesy?

“Sincerely yours,

“JAMES E. CAMPBELL.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

At the meeting of April 13th, Hon. Warren Higley delivered an interesting address upon the "Western Reserve, Its Origin and Settlement," at the close of which General Swayne made a few remarks in his usual happy vein. A number of musical selections were rendered.

The Society gathered for a dinner of an informal nature at the Hotel Imperial on the evening of May 11th. It was the last meeting before separating for the summer season. The attendance was large. Gen. Wager Swayne was toastmaster and performed the duties of the office in his usual satisfactory manner. The first person he called upon was S. S. Packard. A great surprise had been promised for the members. Only a few knew the nature of this surprise beforehand, but Mr. Packard "gave it away," so to speak, as it was intended that he should do. The surprise was in the form of a fine portrait of General Swayne, the president of the Society. It was the work of George R. Boynton, and was presented by a number of the members for the decoration of the rooms.

General Thomas Ewing accepted the portrait for the Society in a few pleasant remarks, and then General Swayne told what he thought about it. He said that, as nothing that in the least resembled him could be a thing of beauty, he was afraid the members would not find the pleasure he wished them in looking upon his picture. Other speakers were Mahlon Chance, E. M. Boynton and Homer Lee.

The opening meeting for the fall of 1891 was held on October 12th, and the following gentlemen were named as the committee for the nomination of officers to serve for the ensuing year: Henry A. Glassford, chairman; Alexander Doyle, John M. Guiteau, Theodore W. Sterling, David Pritchard, J. F. Holloway, Dr. H. Sisson. The president introduced Mrs. E. A. Connor, who delivered an address upon "Ohio in New York." Mrs. Harriet Webb recited "The Defence of the Bride," and musical selections were rendered by Eugene Clarke, Miss Beatrice Maltman and Mr. Will Rising.

The president, in calling the meeting of November 9th to order, made a few remarks relative to the condition of the Society, and referred to the gratifying evidence of good will toward it as shown by the contributions that were beginning to drop into the library, and announced that a "History of Ohio," by Henry Howe, had been presented by Mr. E. C. Bodman: a complete set of the reports of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, by Mr. Sidney D. Maxwell, and the "Memoirs of Grant, Sherman and Sheridan." He then introduced the Hon. James M. Ashley who delivered an address upon "The Proposed Changes in the Constitution of the United States." The report of the nominating committee was then read as follows: President, William L. Strong; Vice-Presidents, Henry L. Burnett, George Milmine, J. Q. A. Ward,

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

C. N. Hoagland, S. S. Packard; Secretary, Wm. Ford Upson; Recording Secretary, H. H. Hobb; Treasurer, Leander H. Crall; Trustees to serve three years, John D. Archbold, Henry H. Vail, John W. Harman.

The annual meeting of 1891 was held on the evening of November 30th. Secretary Higley reported the membership as follows

“ “ “ Non-resident members is.....	62
“ “ “ Honorary members is.....	3
<hr style="width: 10%; margin-left: auto; margin-right: 0;"/>
Making a total of.....	289

The report of the Secretary continued: “As the entertainments for our regular meetings have been arranged by the president and secretary, it may not be inappropriate for me to say something of them in this report. It was decided that our meetings should have more of the literary and social character than formerly, and that ladies should be invited to attend—consequently a speaker was provided for each meeting and an excellent programme of instrumental and vocal music was rendered under the direction of Mr. Eugene Clarke. The vocal part that came after was promoted by a tasteful collation, served by Mazzetti. These meetings have so grown in interest as to tax the capacity of our rooms to accommodate the number attending. They have grown to be very popular and exceedingly enjoyable, and the ladies, especially, are enthusiastic over them.”

The report recapitulated the entertainments of the year and concluded in these words: “But most of all are we indebted for the charm of these meetings, and the prevalent good feeling among the members and the prominent place we occupy among the societies of New York, to our honored president, Gen. Wager Swayne, who has been present at every meeting, and ever been active in forwarding the best interests of the Society.”

Mr. Crall, treasurer, presented his report, showing a balance on hand of $2,151.08.

The annual report of the governing committee recapitulated a number of events already mentioned and continued:

“There was a decided feeling in favor of adding to the attractions of the Society’s rooms, with a view to making them a pleasant place of resort, both for members and Ohio people who might be sojourning in the city. A beautiful crayon portrait of President Swayne, presented by the artist under the auspices of the treasurer (Mr. Crall), and which now adorns our walls, was accepted as a proper movement in this direction, and the procurement, by

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Mr. Foyé, of a marble bust of Thomas Ewing, kindly loaned by the family of General Sherman, was received with special favor by the committee as it has been by the members of the Society at large.

“As will appear in the reports of the treasurer and corresponding secretary the status of the Society as to membership has been kept up during the year, with some few changes as to individuals. The Society has lost by death during the year one honorary, three resident and one non-resident members.

“The death of General Sherman, which occurred on the 14th day of February, was especially noticed by the Society, both in attendance upon the funeral services and in the preparation and presentation of a suitable memorial to the family. A reproduced copy of this memorial, containing also a report of the meeting authorizing the same, and an extract of General Sherman's last speech before the Ohio Society, has been presented to each member of the Society. This speech had a special importance to Ohio people in that it emphasized the known fact that the three great generals of the civil war were Ohio men; and the preservation of the memorial in the hands of the members and in the archives of the Society, was thought to be a sufficient import to warrant the expense. In fact, the committee have felt that to keep the Society along the lines of permanent growth and vitality, it is of the first importance that the lives and services of distinguished citizens of the state should be kept prominently in the foreground. In the report submitted by this committee at our annual meeting last year it was thought proper to dwell at some length on the policy of the Society as emphasized in its history.

“We had but recently passed through an important crisis involving the question of a club as against a society. Efforts had been made with some show of success to secure a club-house, and a permanent home for the Society and its friends. A reaction had come; the club idea been abandoned, and the lines laid down for a departure in the direction which has been assiduously followed during the year. While it was thought best to retain our present rooms and even add to their attractiveness, there has been no movement and no desire expressed in the hearing of the committee looking to the establishment of a club. Under the inspiration and through the kindly efforts of our president the monthly meetings have been maintained on the plan foreshadowed in the last report. At the first monthly meeting since the vacation a delightful address was made by Mrs. Connor upon Ohio in New York, and at the meeting in October a paper was read by Hon. J. M. Ashley upon ‘The Proposed Changes in the Constitution of the United States.’ On both of these occasions the rooms were filled with members and their wives, and great enthusiasm prevailed. During the year, through the kindly services of

Mr. Eugene Clarke, musical and dramatic entertainments have been given, and on other occasions addresses and discussions by the president and other members of the Society. Taking it altogether, the sentiment of the committee and of members who have been positive in their expressions, has been that the monthly entertainments have reached a high average of excellence.

“There has been a feeling often expressed that it would add to the zest of the Society if a few informal dinners could be had during the year, with the good fellowship which such meetings always invoke.”

The election of officers then ensued, and those suggested by the nominating committee, as before quoted, were elected.

Colonel Strong, being called upon, addressed the Society briefly, and expressed his thanks for the honor conferred upon him by his elevation to the presidency, and expressed the hope that the Society might continue to prosper under his administration as it had under that of his predecessors. Mr. Lee stated that the Ohio Society of Chicago were holding their annual banquet in Chicago, and moved that the Ohio Society of New York, through its president, send cordial greeting to the Society at Chicago. Carried unanimously, and messages were at once sent.

The following resolutions, on motion of General Burnett, were unanimously adopted:

“Resolved, That this Society express here and now its grateful and sincere thanks to General Wager Swayne for the able and polite manner in which he has presided over its deliberations during the past three years.

“Resolved, That the sincere thanks of the Society be also tendered to the secretary, recording secretary, treasurer and chairman of the governing committee for the faithful manner in which they have performed their duties during their respective terms of office.”

John D. Archbold became chairman of the governing committee for the ensuing year, and the house committee, consisting of A. J. C. Foyé, E. H. Bodman and Charles B. Peet, were continued for the same period. This action was taken at a meeting held on December 7th.

At the meeting of the Society on December 14th A. J. C. Foyé, acting for the chairman of the entertainment committee, reported as regarded the annual banquet that Friday evening, the 22d of January, 1892, could be secured as an open date when it could engage the banquet hall at Delmonico's. On motion of General Burnett, it was resolved that the rooms be secured for that date, and that the 22d day of January, 1892, be the date fixed for the holding of the banquet and that the entertainment committee be instructed to act promptly and vigorously.

Mr. George E. Wingate, of the Twilight Club, favored the Society with some interesting remarks as to the desire of his association to unite with other societies in engaging meeting rooms, homes, etc. Mr. Harriman read an interesting paper giving his views as to what the Society needed to give more enjoyment to members. Music and refreshments followed.

A special meeting was held on December 30, pursuant to the call of the president, for the purpose of considering a change of date on which to hold the annual banquet. After a discussion of the matter the following resolution, offered by John M. Guiteau, was adopted: "Resolved, That the coming annual banquet be held February 19, 1892, instead of January 22, as previously proposed, and that the place of holding the same be Sherry's instead of Delmonico's."

It was ordered that a committee of twelve be appointed to take charge of this banquet, five of whom should be selected to serve as an entertainment committee for the coming year. The following gentlemen were named by the president: Wager Swayne, Thomas Ewing, Henry L. Burnett, S. S. Packard, Calvin S. Brice, William L. Brown and Samuel Thomas. The entertainment committee for the ensuing year and members of the annual banquet committee, as per above resolution, were Warren Higley, Homer Lee, A. J. C. Foyé, Henry A. Glassford and C. G. Harriman.

In the meeting of February 8, 1892, the newly constituted entertainment committee began its career by several suggestions: That it was especially desired that members volunteer to prepare papers on appropriate topics to be read at the regular meetings; also favorably as to the propriety of having the rooms opened for ladies; also favorably as to the continuing of musical entertainment. A letter was read from the Ohio Society of Detroit, Mich., asking for a copy of the constitution and by-laws, and the secretary was directed to send the same.

The seventh annual banquet was held on the evening of February 20th, one day later than that proposed in the above resolution, at Sherry's, on Fifth avenue and Thirty-seventh street. It was referred to on the following morning* in these words:

"Ohio has been described by a wit as a state which is high in the middle and round at both ends. That was precisely the condition of the New York assemblage last evening. They were high in the middle, with General Wager Swayne as presiding officer, and they were round at both ends, to such an extent that one of those present was easily pushed from the hall. It seems almost incredible that any one who appreciated the importance of a gathering of Ohio men should have to be expelled by force, though such was the case last evening. General Swayne described the man as a ventriloquist. He probably was. During the progress of General Swayne's speech there were interruptions which appeared to come from certain groups and opposite walls. 'You bet!' 'Good for Ohio!' 'Ohio leads the way,' and so on, were the words uttered in a mysterious manner, and these followed throughout the address of Congressman Outhwaite. All at once there was a commotion, and then the shuffling of an individual along the aisles, until the outer door was closed upon him. General Swayne, in explanation, at the close of Congressman Outhwaite's speech, said the man was not an Ohioan; that no seat had been assigned him and he was an intruder, and had been ejected as a disturber of the peace; and, from all appearances, it was a thoroughly proper act, though his disappearance did detract somewhat from the amusement of the occasion."

Col. William L. Strong, the president of the Society, was unable, on account of illness, to be present. The secretary of war, Mr. Elkins; the secretary of the interior, Mr. Noble; the secretary of agriculture, Mr. Rusk, and Senator Brice did not appear as it was expected they would.

Congressman Outhwaite responded for "The State of Ohio." His address was a defence of the natural modesty of the Ohio man, wherever he is found; and there was an appreciative cheer in the throat as well as an appreciative smile on the countenance of every Ohio man present. It is only fair to say that there was an entire absence of partisanship displayed, and the appearance of Mr. Outhwaite was greeted with as much applause as the mention of the name of William McKinley, Jr.

Ex-Governor Campbell responded for "The Governors of Ohio," and his address continued for forty-five minutes, thus establishing the fact that, in the opinion of a Democratic ex-governor of the state, that high office is entitled to respectful consideration; and everything that ex-Governor Campbell said was appreciated because of the pleasant way in which he introduced his commendations of the character of the men who have gone before him in that important office, irrespective of party affiliations. Indeed, ex-Governor Campbell said many pleasant things of men in both political parties of that day, and his address was listened to with close attention. He touched gently upon the fact that his native Ohio modesty had not secured for him success in the contest with Major McKinley, but that he was not too modest to say that "the governors of Ohio have been men of standing, culture, ability and honor to their generation and to the great state of Ohio," and the applause which followed the announcement proved that everybody present thought just as the speaker thought, even though he included himself in the list. His reference to the position which Ohio has attained in the matter of the national judiciary brought forth an enthusiastic response.

The other toasts were: "The Congressman Abroad," to which Murat

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Halstead responded in a pleasant manner. Captain Hugh R. Gardon, of the Southern Society, was present, and spoke patriotically for the best elements south of Mason and Dixon's line. Congressman Harter, of Mansfield, Ohio, who came from Washington fresh from his contests with Mr. Bland on the silver question, was splendidly received when he arose to respond to the toast. Col. James M. Varnum, of New York, spoke for "The Ordinance of 1787."

The dinner was well served, and the taste in art employed in the preliminaries was worthy of praise. The menu-card was attractive, suggestive of pioneer endeavor in the construction of a great state. There was much enjoyment, good-fellowship and manifestation of patriotic unity throughout the entire programme.

The following letter of regret was received by General Swayne and read at this gathering:

"UNITED STATES SENATE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1892.

"Hon. Wager Swayne, New York.

"My Dear Sir: I am laid up in my room with a disorder in one of my eyes, so that I cannot accept your exceedingly attractive invitation to the Ohio banquet. It is always a pleasure to me to hear about Ohio or to talk about Ohio. It would be especially delightful to do this in the company of so many of her famous sons as will gather at your banquet. The importance of what was done at Marietta in 1788 is not likely to be overstated even by the most affectionate and reverent of her sons. Its consequences grow in importance with the growth of the nation, with the mighty life of constitutional liberty itself. The dwelling house of Rufus Putnam, where he and Tupper sat up all night to frame the plan of the Ohio Company, and from which in the early morning went forth the call for its first meeting, still stands unchanged in Worcester county, Mass., about twelve miles north of the populous city of Worcester. It is a simple wooden dwelling, but it ought to be treasured and preserved as a shrine second only to Mt. Vernon itself.

"I shall be hungry to read the proceedings of your gathering and am, faithfully yours,

"GEO. F. HOAR."

The regular meeting of the Society was held at Morelli's on March 15th, and Col. William L. Strong occupied the chair at both the business meeting and the informal banquet which followed. The subject of club rooms was taken up, and after discussion a motion was offered by General Swayne that possession of the club rooms, No. 236 Fifth Avenue, be given up. This was carried, and the matter of procuring new quarters was referred to the governing committee, with power to act.

President Strong informed the members that he had cabled to the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, minister to France, on behalf of the Society, tendering him a reception on his return to this country.* He also offered a resolution to the effect that the Society should give a banquet to Mr. Reid on or about the 7th of April, the exact date to be determined later. On motion of Mr. Crall, it was ordered that the banquet committee which served at the last annual banquet, should act in a similar capacity at the Reid dinner, and that General Swayne be chairman of said committee.

* There is an interesting bit of inside history connected with this event. Several of the members of the Ohio Society learned that the Union League Club were contemplating a banquet to Mr. Reid. The fact was communicated to President Strong, who did not wait for the mails. He made the offer by cable, and once more Ohio was the first in the field.

CHAPTER IX

THIS banquet in honor of Mr. Reid, a member of the Society, was given at Delmonico's on the evening of Saturday, April 9, 1892. The names of the committee in charge were as follows: Wager Swayne, chairman; William L. Strong, Calvin S. Brice, W. L. Brown, Henry L. Burnett, Leander H. Crall, Thomas Ewing, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Henry A. Glassford, Curtis G. Harriman, Warren Higley, Homer Lee, S. S. Packard, Samuel Thomas, William Ford Upson. The spirit which actuated the Society in this gathering, and the reason why it occurred, were well set forth in a New York newspaper of the following day,* which said:

“About thirty years ago there was a young man in the town of Xenia, Ohio, who possessed in abundance those traits which the natives of that state are proud to think the peculiar characteristics of the Ohio young man—energy, fidelity, perseverance, perspicacity and commanding ability. He was a young newspaper writer, and he used his talents so well that he became successively the first writer on the foremost journal of his state, a noted war correspondent, a writer for a New York daily, then its editor and guiding spirit and finally United States Minister to France. That was Mr. Whitelaw Reid. Last night at Delmonico's the Ohio Society of New York, of which Mr. Reid was the first vice-president, celebrated the triumph of the traits of the Ohioan in his career, to voice the applause of his fellow citizens at his diplomatic successes and to give him, as their honored son, the right hand of welcome home at a great banquet.”

A distinguished company assembled in the large banqueting hall, to join with the Ohio men in doing honor to the distinguished guest. Two members of the cabinet of the United States sat with many eminent public men and journalists of New York and other cities on the speaker's platform. Among the six hundred guests at the other tables were some of the foremost New Yorkers and some who had come from as far as Cincinnati to be present.

Gen. Wager Swayne presided, in the absence of President Strong, who was detained by a family affliction. At his right, beyond Mr. Reid, were Charles Foster, secretary of the treasury; Warner Miller, George W. Childs, of Philadelphia; Chas. A. Dana, Frank R. Lawrence and D. O. Mills. At the chairman's left were Stephen B. Elkins, secretary of war; A. K. McClure, of Philadelphia; Chauncey M. Depew, Murat Halstead, Vicomte Paul d'Absac, Consul General of France in New York; St. Clair McKelway, Ballard Smith and Gen. Thomas Ewing. Mrs. Reid, Mrs. Swayne, Mrs. D. O. Mills and other ladies had seats in the gallery.

At the six other tables were W. W. Bostwick, Henry W. Cannon, Richard Butler, Russell B. Harrison, Richard Smith, Sr.; ex-Judge Noah Davis, ex-Judge John F. Dillon, Horace White, Gen. Horace Porter, B. H. Bristow, Col. John A. McCall, Franklin Edson, the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field, Albert Bierstadt, Gen. Thomas T. Eckert, Col. John J. McCook, and Robert E. Bonner, etc.

The banquet began at half-past six o'clock. Ohio was not forgotten in the decorations of the occasion. Her coat of arms was emblazoned on the gallery fronting the speakers and reappeared on the elaborately engraved menu cards. The flags and arms of the American and French republics were intertwined on these cards.

It was after nine o'clock when Gen. Swayne arose to call the assemblage to order and to introduce the speechmaking of the evening. He began by saying:

"There once was a time when Horace Greeley signalized himself by saying to a certain young man, 'Come East, young man!' and so our guest of the evening did as many of you have done. If it be true that this night the great soul of Horace Greeley contemplates us, we may be sure that his great soul joins with ours in this greeting. No man could be so truly the forerunner of those friends who will come to the World's Fair next year as our returning minister, Mr. Reid."

General Swayne then, in a few graceful words of compliment, introduced the guest of the evening, Mr. Reid, who was received with most enthusiastic applause. The entire company arose and cheered for several minutes, while the air was white with fluttering napkins.

When the enthusiastic Ohioans were ready to hear him Mr. Reid spoke with a hearty emphasis that showed the sincerity of his appreciation as follows:

"MR. CHAIRMAN: No greeting could touch me more profoundly than this. No words could go straighter to my heart than yours, and when I remember what honor your father brought our state, and the nation, I am doubly glad that, in the regretted absence of its president, it is by your voice the Ohio Society receives me back.

"This is indeed an ideal welcome. It gives the first hand grasp from the metropolis which is our home and our pride, and at the same time it carries me really home—to that fairest of lands that lies between the lakes and the beautiful river—to the dear, gracious mother of us all. When she stretches out her hand the joy of return is complete.

“No other applause can ever be so sweet to a man as that which comes from those who have known him earliest and longest. Better, to many a tired man of the world, the cheer of his native village than more stately honors from the most powerful of communities. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, in retiring from public office there can be no compliment more grateful than an assurance like this with which you honor me to-night, that your old friends and neighbors have not been ashamed of you.

“And next, it is pleasant to be made to feel once more that those to whom you were sent were not tired of you. Two weeks ago, at a banquet like this, I had the honor to say goodbye to the high members of the French government, and to representative Frenchmen who were kind enough to say they were sorry to have me go. To-night I find my friend, the Viscount d’Absac representing the same government here, to add another grace to the warmth of this most charming of greetings to a returning townsman. In the large banquet hall of the Continental, in trying to express to the great American colony and to the Frenchmen about me the conflicting emotions by which I was possessed, I told the simple truth in saying that while I was eager, even to homesickness, in my desire to get back to New York, I did not in the least want to leave Paris.

“Who that has ever passed under the spell of the City of Light—the one city of the world—can fail to understand or to sympathize with the truly Irish perplexity? Who that has ever known France or the French will not join with me in urging the duty, not merely of perpetual friendship, but of the warmest appreciation for that fascinating and chivalric people who have for many centuries commanded the admiration or the wonder of the world, and who are now well entered on the second century of an unbroken and most helpful friendship for us? I never met a Frenchman, from the Elysée or the Faubourg St. Germain to the forests of Auvergne, who did not, as soon as he found I was an American, receive me without question as a friend. We shall see more of them here during the next year, and I hope every American to whom the opportunity may come will exert himself to make them feel as much at home among us as we have always made ourselves and been made at home among them.

“Those of us who have entered the fifties have learned that there is no great happiness in this world without attendant pain. To-night the joy of coming back is marked by finding such gaps in your ranks. The numbers, to be sure, are not diminished; but, ah! what faces we miss. I cannot speak in the Ohio Society after a three years’ absence without one word of tender and reverential regard for the memory of your greatest member. Rough on the surface, sometimes, as a chestnut burr, but always sweet and tender inside as the nut; that is the man as one loves to recall him. We had occasionally the sharpest differences of opinion, and yet, from my early manhood till he said goodbye to me on sailing, he had honored me with his friendship. Not a syllable do I care to utter to-night of his public career. The world has long known that by heart. I only wish, as I recall the kind parting and the kinder messages and letters sent over seas, and as I now note the vacant place, to pause before it for a moment and salute the mighty shade. What glories the future may have in store for the Ohio Society we know not, but the past, at least, is secure. We have had William Tecumseh Sherman.

“We have had another, too, whose absence strikes sadly on a returning son of the State. He had guided the finances of the country through a most critical period—Ohio has had a specialty of great finance ministers, from Ewing and Chase and Sherman to Foster. He had achieved a brilliant success. Mr. Windom stood to the financial world as the champion of sound measures and as the pledge of national solvency and faith and honor, and in that moment, in a supreme effort, he fell. When in a foreign land I read the story, grief for the great loss was almost swallowed up in pride for the splendid end this son of Ohio had made.

“There is no occasion to-night to call the roll of our Ohio worthies. We have never been charged, even by our worst enemies, with ever neglecting the duty to celebrate ourselves. But perhaps you will permit me a single reminiscence. On one of the last occasions when I had the opportunity to act in the office with which you honored me as vice president of the Ohio Society I found an occasion, in presenting to you a gentleman who had been recently dropped from the Senate, and had thereupon described himself as a ‘dead statesman,’ to put out that, nevertheless, he had in him the material for an uncommonly live President. Well, gentlemen, I haven’t yet seen the necessity of apologizing for any mistake made in that prediction as to the future of that particular member of this society.

“Now, it is said that the other party is looking about for a candidate. But why should it have the slightest difficulty? Here is the first president of the Ohio Society ready to its hand—statesman himself, and the son of a statesman, and although he has the proverbial shyness of both the politician and the lawyer, I will undertake to be responsible that he will answer quite soon after his name is called.

“It has been sometimes said that there are two kinds of men in this country—those who were born in Ohio and those who wish they had been. A brilliant example of the latter class is with us to-night; and very pleasant it is for tired eyes to rest on the familiar features of this prince of orators and of good fellows. His genius and versatility have accomplished wonders in the way of acquiring nationalities; but this is a shining height he has not reached. He has, on a hundred occasions and to the entire satisfaction of thousands of auditors, announced himself as a Dutchman, a Puritan, a Huguenot, a Scotchman, a native of Peekskill and a bit of an Irishman. But he has missed the crown. He was never born in Ohio—and now I am afraid he never will be.

HON. WHITELAW REID

“Nevertheless, the Ohio man continues to be prevalent. In the present cabinet, for example, out of the eight members four of them are from Ohio—and two of them are here to-night to explain the circumstance. When these four Cabinet officers vote together and the President joins with them the rest of the concern must feel lonely!

“Mr. President, I forbear. The trend of feeling seems to be toward levity. And yet nothing could be further from my purpose. I am most happy to find myself so thoroughly at home—so completely surrounded by those I know the best and prize the highest. I am most grateful for the care which has assembled here so many whom it is a pride and pleasure for me to meet again—Howells, almost the oldest and certainly one of the dearest of my friends, with whom I lived in the same house nearly a third of a century ago, when he paid his board out of a salary of $15 a week, and I out of one a good deal less; Ward, who made statues in those days, while we made newspaper articles, and whose early wares have lasted better; the gentlemen of my own profession—Mr. Childs, who is the friend of all of us; Colonel McClure and Mr. McKelway, who lend to the wrong side such potent and persuasive pens; my old master in the newspaper business, Mr. Richard Smith, and my old opponent, Mr. Murat Halstead; Mr. Gilder, who has made one of the most successful magazines in the world; the delegates of the club which for fourteen years endured me as its president; these representatives of the government—national, state and city—and this whole brilliant and imposing assemblage. I am touched beyond words that you should have shown me this kindness. I am happy to have escaped in apparent safety from public service and to be received among you again, and I close as I began with a heartfelt expression of my profoundest and most grateful thanks.”

There were again three cheers and a tiger when Mr. Reid closed speaking, and his health was drunk once more with great enthusiasm.

General Swayne, in introducing the next speaker, said that it was in the room in which they were assembled that Benjamin Harrison was first nominated for President of the United States. The President was not with them, he was sorry to say, but he was represented by the ranking member of the Cabinet. He called upon the Hon. Charles Foster, secretary of the treasury, to respond to the next toast, “International Commerce.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

An enthusiastic round of applause greeted Mr. Foster as he rose in answer to this introduction. When the cheering had subsided he said:

“MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: If I have paid my dues I am a member of this Society. I am not quite certain about that. But I ought to be a member in good standing.

“I have been a member of the Society from the beginning. I am here to-night, as your president said, as the ranking officer of the Cabinet of President Harrison, to testify to you to the great success of Minister Reid while representing the United States at the court of France.

“Mr. Reid had considerable to say about Ohio. We never do forget to glorify ourselves. While I was Governor of Ohio I was often called upon, upon occasions somewhat similar to this, to respond for the State of Ohio. It began to be irksome. I began to study why Ohio had distinguished herself beyond all other States. I found a peculiar condition of things—a condition that existed in no other state. I found that our manufactures, our mining, our agricultural and our industrial enterprises existed there in more equal proportions than in any other state.

“New York and New England are largely manufacturing sections and the South and the West are agricultural. Now, all these great forces operating upon the minds of the people of Ohio as equally produce a level headedness, while in New York and New England these forces, not operating equally, produce a lopsidedness. Our institutions are peculiar. We believe them to be the best of any country on earth. Certainly here every man, be he rich or poor, has an equal chance in the race for life. We believe in rotation in office—but not just now.

“We have no class of people until recently—perhaps we may get some in the civil service—who hold their offices. Yet in other countries in Europe in the diplomatic service the diplomats are trained from boyhood and remain in that service all their lives. In this country we pick up our diplomats from our lawyers, our merchants, our newspaper people, and we send them abroad to discharge their duty. Now I undertake to say that from Benjamin Franklin down to the present time our diplomats have been as able and as successful and, I think, more so, in the discharge of these duties than the trained men of other countries. And, I think, my friends, that one of the finest illustrations we have of the success of the newspaper fraternity exists in that of Mr. Reid.”

General Swayne next introduced, to answer to the toast “Our Foreign Relations” the secretary of war, Stephen B. Elkins, who was received with great enthusiasm as he rose to respond.

Mr. Elkins said that as a member of the Ohio Society he felt honored at taking part in this reception and expressing respect and regard for a fellow member who, by his ability in the untried field of diplomacy, had gained new laurels and added to his fame and distinction in this and other lands.

On behalf of the administration it was the speaker's most pleasing duty of saying to Minister Reid in this presence that the chief executive and those associated with him in administering the affairs of this great republic sent him words of cordial greeting and a warm welcome on his return home. Mr. Elkins then continued:

“You went abroad taking with you the esteem and affection of many of the leading men of your country. You had already risen to distinction, and your name, your ability and your varied accomplishments were widely known and appreciated. You return decorated with the confidence and approbation of the two great leading republics of the world, by reason of your great services to both. It will be remembered by many here that at the first annual dinner of the Society the distinguished gentleman now President of the United States was an invited guest. Our guest, then our Vice President, in fitting and graceful terms, called on General Harrison to respond to a sentiment, and in his remarks ventured to suggest that it was among the possibilities that another Harrison might some day fill the Presidential chair. From this happy allusion some members of the Ohio Society claim they saw in the speaker, as he responded with that clearness, power and strength which always characterized his graceful oratory, what his countrymen later on discovered, that he was fitted for the high office of President, and to which by their choice he was soon after elevated.

“As Ohio men we are proud of our Ohio President. He enjoys the confidence of his countrymen everywhere. He has shown to the country and world in point of integrity, intellectual force, power of administration and ability to deal with large and difficult questions that he will stand among the first of the great Presidents of the Republic. It is a source of pride to the society that the state of Ohio has given to this administration the President and four members of his Cabinet, an event not likely to occur again in the history of any state in the Union. The administration rejoices in Minister Reid's success. His services to his country in his high office are among his best assets. The great secretary under whom he served reports that he is detained at Washington and prevented from joining in this reception. He could and would tell you were he here with what ability, zeal and satisfaction to him Minister Reid always discharged his duties and the beneficial results he secured to his country.”

Mr. Elkins concluded his address by paying an eloquent tribute to the gifted wife of Minister Reid.

After Mr. Elkins, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew was the next speaker. His appearance was greeted with a salvo of applause which must have warmed the cockles of his heart. The toast to which he responded was "New York's Welcome." Mr. Depew said:

"GENTLEMEN: It is a rare pleasure and privilege to participate in the event we celebrate to-night. Both the absence and the return of our guest are fortunate for himself and his country. Abroad he conferred honor upon the republic and gained distinction for himself. By returning he adds to the happiness of his friends.

"During the last ten years it has fallen to my lot on many occasions to deliver a eulogy upon some distinguished son of Ohio. In every instance he was dead. It created an impression in my mind that there was a mysterious relation between an eminent soldier or citizen of Ohio and the grave. It is an inspiration and a tonic for both my nerves and my spirits to be able to speak of a son of Ohio whose fame is international and who is very much alive. If there be any doubts on that question it will be dissipated through the columns of the New York Tribune during the coming months of the Presidential canvass. It will be discovered that this accomplished journalist has not lost the art of occasionally criticising his party friends when they deserve it, and continually scorning his party enemies because they always deserve it.

"The one act of President Harrison which has received the greatest criticism has been his appointment of journalists to diplomatic places. We lawyers have felt especially aggrieved that after entering upon the legislative fields, which we have always called our own, they should have assumed to aspire to places which the lawyers have always regarded as belonging by right to them. 'What,' say the critics, 'can the journalist whose time and mind and training have been given to the discussion of theoretical politics, practical religion, sociological questions, of party candidates and responding at innumerable banquets to the toast of "The Press" know about international law and the delicate matters of diplomacy?"

"Only twice in the history of the relations between France and the United States as nations has France been prominently and interestingly in the eye and mind of the American people. First, when she gave us the assistance which secured our independence, and second, when there was negotiated with her a treaty which will be of incalculable advantage to the people of this country. In the first instance our minister was Benjamin Franklin and in the second Whitelaw Reid, both journalists.

"By sentiment and service we are more closely bound to France than any other European nations, and yet in the rapidity of our own development and the crowding events which have brought us in commercial communion or collision with other nations, we have taken little account of and given little thought to France during the last hundred years. Her fleet, her army and her credit enabled us to bring our revolution to a triumphant conclusion; and the ideas of liberty absorbed here by the French soldiers and carried back to France revolutionized the continent of Europe. Upon the lines of civil and religious freedom and of the ideas and the measures which tend to the promotion of the happiness of mankind France and the United States have developed together. Their friendly relations have been enormously strengthened by the moral support which we gave the young republic in its struggle for the permanence of its free institutions; by the vigorous, wise and enlightened course of the American minister who is our guest to-night.

“Our poets, our orators and our great writers, in celebrating the glories of our Western Empire, have all failed to recognize in epic verse and fitting phrase that principal and perennial source of our prosperity, the American hog. He, more than any other agency, has solved the problem of the farm and the market. When the Western farmer would be compelled to burn his corn because the price at the seaboard would not enable him to bear the cost of transportation, this intelligent animal consumes the corn, chemically works it up in his own person into profitable pork, and then transports himself to market to clear the mortgage from the farm and add to the wealth of his country.

“The governments of the Old World have always been jealous of our growth and prosperity and fearful of the penetrating and propagating power of American ideas. They could not keep out Yankees, for they go everywhere. They could not keep out Yankee inventions, for their adoption was necessary if they would keep pace in industrial competitions. They could not keep out American wheat, because their fields were insufficient to raise their own supply. But in self-preservation and with marvelous unanimity, and backing up the effort with the whole force of their great armaments, they banished and then prohibited the re-entrance of the American hog. For eleven years this great staple of our country has been denied admission. The popular sentiment was so strong in favor of the prohibition that any attempt to remove it threatened to hurl the government of the day from power. It was to this most difficult task that Mr. Reid applied his ability and his energy. His success has moved the torpid pulse of the Chamber of Commerce to enthusiastic gratitude, and has done more for the commerce and wealth of our country than any single diplomatic transaction of the last decade.

“It is an old saw that every good American goes to Paris before he dies. It is generally admitted that the visit hastens that desired or lamented event. Paris is known to our countrymen as the metropolis where their women are gowned and their men bankrupted. For the last three years we, which means virtually the majority of the American people who travel, have found in Paris a model American home, whose perfect appointments made us proud of our country, and whose generous hospitality made us feel at home.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“The position of an American minister among the ironclad customs and inflexible traditions of the diplomatic service in the older countries is not a happy one. According to immemorial usage the ambassador, in the absence of his sovereign, is the sovereign in person, or if his state is not monarchical he represents the sovereignty of the commonwealth. Immemorial usage assigns to the minister only the dignity of a diplomatic agent. At the great capitals like Paris all the Powers of Europe and Asia send ambassadors, the republics of South America and the Isthmus send ambassadors, and Hayti is represented by an ambassador. Whenever the representatives of these governments call upon the Foreign Minister of France the obsequious attendant throws open both doors of the Foreign Office to the ambassador; he opens one door to admit the American minister. At state receptions, official functions, Presidential dinners, the American minister decorates the rear of the diplomatic procession and sits next to Hayti at the foot of the table.

“Our adherence as a nation to this Spartan simplicity decorates the rhetoric of the Fourth of July orator as to the prestige and power of the great republic, and degrades among his official associates the representatives of the great republic. The American minister, who is thus officially handicapped and who has a proper patriotic appreciation of the dignity and position which his government rightfully holds among the nations of the earth, has a most difficult and delicate task. But it can be truthfully said by every one who was on the spot to observe that with tact which was never at fault, and dignity which compelled recognition, and assertiveness which was never offensive, and a pride which was never arrogant, the grandeur and glory of the republic of the United States so pervaded all official assemblages when the minister was present that for the last three years wherever the American minister has sat has been next to the head of the table.

“New York stands to the people in all parts of our country as does a great university to its young men. The student who has won academic honors in Ohio or California, in Idaho or Indiana, comes to Yale or Harvard. Thereafter for the rest of his life he is known as an alumnus of Yale or Harvard. So the man who has grown too large for his neighborhood or his state in the West, the South, the East or the North, comes to New York. Here he is welcomed without ardor and given such equal chance among the Knickerbockers, or finds himself crystallized among the ‘four hundred.’

“It is this cosmopolitan spirit which gives New York an Ohio Society larger than any to be found in any city in Ohio and a Southern Society stronger than any organized in any city in the South. It is in this spirit that we have more Germans than in any German city save Berlin, and more Irish than in any city in the Emerald Isle. It was this attraction which brought to us Ohio’s great son, General Grant, and caused him to request that he might be buried upon our island, a request which I trust will soon be honored by a monument erected over his grave worthy the great captain and the great metropolis. It was the multiplied charms of New York which drew here the most attractive soldier of our time and made him loved by us as he loved us, another of Ohio's grand contributions to the glory of the republic, General Sherman. New York welcomes the children of her adoption, when they are worthy of her recognition, with the same unstinted and generous gratitude or honor as she does her children to the manner born. I speak for her best impulses, for her vigorous manhood, for her broad and catholic judgment, when I say on her behalf to Whitelaw Reid: 'Welcome! thrice welcome, back to New York!'

"The Molder of Public Opinion" was the toast to which Col. Alexander K. McClure, editor of the Philadelphia Times, was called upon to respond. During the course of his speech he said:

"This is to me a most pleasant occasion. I have known the distinguished guest of the evening for thirty years as a journalist; remember him well as one of the most brilliant of the remarkable galaxy of war correspondents developed during the Rebellion and have noticed his rapid advancement to the very front rank of his profession, not only with the pride that I have always felt in those who dignify the newspaper calling, but also with the gratification that ever comes to us all when cherished friends attain exceptional success. There is eminent fitness in this gathering of distinguished sons of Ohio to do honor to Whitelaw Reid, who is now a leading figure in American progress as journalist and diplomat, but whose name will be cherished chiefly, not only in this but in other lands, as one who has shed the richest lustre upon American journalism.

"What is journalism in this great republic? In England it has been called the fourth estate; in the free institutions of America, where the people are sovereign and where the newspapers are the chief educator of those who govern the land, the press is the first estate. Like all great elements of power it has its shadowed aspects. It has many teachers of its own creation that are discredit to the great calling and a reproach to the most intelligent people of the earth; but discounted by all its imperfections the press of the United States is the best the world has ever known and is the most potent of all the varied factors in our free government.

"I regard the editorial chair as the highest public trust of our free institutions. Presidents, Cabinets, Senates, representative bodies come and play their brief parts and pass away, many of them into forgetfulness, and great parties rise and fall in the swift mutations of the political efforts of a free people. Journalism not only survives all the varied changes of our political system, but its duties and responsibilities multiply with each year as it becomes more and more the great teacher of the people in their homes.

"When President Harrison came into power he honored himself by nominating to three of the four first class missions of the government distinguished representatives of American journals—Whitelaw Reid to France, Charles Emory Smith to Russia and Murat Halstead to Germany. High as was the compliment paid to journalism by the President, the highest compliment of all was paid to Mr. Halstead when he was rejected by a Senate of his own political faith, and an exceptional compliment was paid to Mr. Reid, the honored guest of the evening, by his narrow escape from rejection by the same body. There was not an objection urged against the confirmation of either of these eminent journalists that was not inspired by resentment for the best journalistic efforts of their lives. It was the manly, fearless criticism of public men and public measures, the exposure of the infirmities and perfidy of those who pose as representative statesmen of the republic, that honored Mr. Halstead by refusing him the mission for which he had been nominated, and that paid a rare tribute to Mr. Reid by grudgingly assenting to his appointment. The cowardly, submissive journalist is innocent of antagonisms; the aggressive, fearless, faithful journalist commands the highest distinction of malignant hostility from all who make politics a trade and prostitute statesmanship to mean ambition and jobbery.

“I recall also with great pleasure the fact that the two great editors who were confirmed to fill first class missions have both voluntarily resigned to resume their newspaper duties. We are here to-night to welcome Mr. Reid back to his high public trust of journalism, and in Philadelphia we shall soon be able to welcome Mr. Smith, who has resigned his mission and will resume the great calling of his life. These leaders of our profession have learned the littleness of official trust when compared with the highest of all public trusts—the direction of a great newspaper.

“Need I remind this intelligent assembly of Horace Greeley, confessedly the ablest of all the many able journalists our country has produced? He was often more potent even than the President, and no man ever accomplished so much in the education of the people in all that was beneficent and just. He cared not for the honors or emoluments of public office, but he had fought the battles of the people. He had braved obloquy in his tireless efforts for the oppressed and lowly and his great sympathetic heart, that ever beat responsive to the cries of the oppressed, craved the grateful recognition of the people to whose cause he sincerely devoted his life. A brief term in Congress proved to all, as it must have proved to himself, that while the great editor was a master in criticising the imperfections of public men, the Congressman who had criticised his fellows through his own newspaper columns was a dismal failure. At last the great dream of his life gave promise of fulfilment as he was nominated for the Presidency; but the clouds came, his hopes perished, and, smitten in all that he loved or dreamed of, his death was welcomed by his friends as ending the fitful life that had settled in a starless midnight of mental darkness.

“And Raymond, whose name is spoken with reverence by every American journalist; the only man whose lance was never shivered in his many conflicts with his great master, is now hardly remembered as legislator, Speaker, Lieutenant Governor and member of Congress. He was a leader of leaders in politics. He was at the baptismal font of republicanism, and he penned the platform of Pittsburg in 1856, that crystallized the greatest party of American history and made the most heroic achievements of any civilization of the world. I have seen him calm in a turbulent National Convention; call it to order and method, and guide it to the great results of its mission; but who remembers him as Congressman save as the target of the matchless invective of Stevens, or as having recorded failure after failure in statesmanship.

“Dana, the Nestor of American journalism, dated his great success and power as a newspaper man when he indignantly declined a second place in the Customs of your city, tendered to him by a President whose election he had favored. Thenceforth he was free from the thongs of political expectation, and no one has more pointedly illustrated the difference in distinction and achievement between the editor who puts journalism before party and party honors and the editor who struggles for party success to share party spoils.

“The elder Bennett has grandly illustrated the true theory of journalism by the assumption that a great editor could never be an acceptable popular candidate for any party, and I have reason to know that he regarded it as the crowning distinction of his life that he had the opportunity to decline, as incompatible with his journalistic duties, the same mission from which our honored guest of to-night has just returned.

“The time was when journalism was confined to party organs and when newspapers were a luxury. Public office was then measurably compatible with the public trust of journalism; but that age has passed away never to return. To-day the newspaper is the educator of the home, and is read in almost every family in the land. It is the daily lesson to our children; the daily monitor to those who exercise the sovereignty of our government. It is constant in its duties and its achievements. On great occasions it arouses public sentiment to aggressive action; in common times it is ceaselessly fulfilling its mission as gently as the dews which jewel the flowers of the early morning, and it is the one calling of our free land that cannot be dependent upon the whims of party leaders or the resentments of those who control official positions. It must be ‘unawed by influence, unbribed by gain.’ Such is the true mission of the journalist where journalism is so inseparably interwoven with the sovereignty of the republic, and it is to this high trust and duty that we welcome back the honored guest of the evening.”

General Swayne said that a welcome home to New York to ex-Minister

Reid would be incomplete without a word of greeting from Brooklyn. He therefore called upon St. Clair McKelway, of Brooklyn, to say a few words. In the beginning of his speech Mr. McKelway intimated that "Mr. Reid had returned home perhaps to receive a greater honor in connection with his party's nomination for the Vice Presidency," a suggestion that was received with the greatest applause.

Mr. McKelway said that he spoke for the press of New York, and in that capacity he dwelt at length upon Mr. Reid's career as a newspaper editor in New York, his methods, the ideas he sought to introduce in his own journal and his influence upon journalism generally. He paid a very high tribute to Mr. Reid's journalistic ability, and particularly commended the high moral character of the paper he conducted. He praised Mr. Reid for assisting to put a stop to personal contests in editorial writings and closed with a eulogy of his services as Minister to France. He said:

"Mr. Reid in France has worthily honored an office in which Franklin, Washburne, Dayton, McLean and Bigelow and John A. Dix won for themselves a lustre as bright as the day and as long as time. He brings back the gratitude of all Americans abroad with whom he has been in contact, and he meets here not only the greetings of his friends around these tables, and not only the congratulations of his fellow laborers in all the newspaper offices of the English speaking world, but the salutations of his countrymen and their best wishes for his happiness and prosperity, either on the lines of his resumed profession or on the paths of any higher duties that events in their unfolding may solicit or require him to tread."

Ex-Senator Warner Miller made a brief response to the sentiment, "Our Commercial Facilities."

Frank R. Lawrence, Mr. Reid's successor as president of the Lotus Club, welcomed Mr. Reid home as the spokesman of a numerous delegation from the Lotus Club, who were among the guests.

Then the merry company dispersed with three cheers and a tiger for Whitelaw Reid.

Among the many letters of regret from eminent men who had been invited was the following from the French Minister to the United States:

"THE LEGATION OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March, 1892.

"GENERAL: You have done me the honor to invite me to take part in the banquet that your society has tendered to Mr. Whitelaw Reid after his arrival in New York on the 9th of April. I hasten to thank you for your courtesy and regret that it will not be possible for me to accept, as I already have another engagement for that day. I regret this all the more because during my stay in Paris I had occasion to appreciate the extreme courtesy of the honorable representative from the United States, and because I should have been very happy to associate myself with this occasion of expression of esteem which is given to Mr. Reid by his compatriots. Accept, General, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration. PATENOTRE.

“To Gen. Henry L. Burnett, No. 45 Cedar Street, New York.”

Vice President Morton wrote as follows:

“VICE PRESIDENT’S CHAMBER,
“WASHINGTON, March 31, 1892.

“MY DEAR GENERAL: I very much regret that previous engagements deprive me of the pleasure of accepting the invitation of the Ohio Society to be present at the banquet to be given the Hon. Whitelaw Reid on the 9th of April.

“Mr. Reid has discharged his duties as the representative of his country to our sister republic of the Old World with conspicuous ability, in a manner alike honorable to his country and himself, and it would be a source of great gratification if I could join the members of the society of his native state, and present in person my cordial congratulations, a hearty greeting and a warm welcome to our distinguished guest on his return to his native land.

“Thanking the Society for the courtesy extended, I am, with renewed regrets, very faithfully and truly yours, “LEVI P. MORTON.

Other letters were from Senator Frank Hiscock, Senator Joseph R. Hawley, of Connecticut; ex-Minister to England E. J. Phelps, George William Curtis, Secretary Rusk, who was detained at Washington; Col. John Hay and Frank Hatton.

A number of ladies were present at the meeting of the Society held on April 18th. Vice-President Henry L. Burnett occupied the chair, as President Strong was absent on account of the death of his mother. Mr. Crall, treasurer, reported that the financial part of the Reid banquet, like all other parts of it, had been a success. With Vice-President Packard in the chair, General Burnett entertained the Society with a most interesting address, relating his services at Washington under the great war secretary, Stanton, immediately after the assassination of President Lincoln. Then followed a programme of music under the direction of Eugene Clarke. A collation was served. At the meeting of May 9th Mr. Foyé reported for the governing committee that the present rooms of the Society had been engaged for another year, at a reduction of $700 in rent. The report was accepted. The treasurer reported a balance on hand of $2,900. General Swayne offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

“WHEREAS, New York city has shown a most hospitable welcome to Ohio men, and has many times given generously to Ohio public and educational purposes, and,

“WHEREAS, New York city at this time is giving liberally to a memorial of a son of Ohio, General Ulysses S. Grant, and,

“WHEREAS, The chancellor of the University of the City of New York, a member of the Ohio Society, has interested several of our members in the establishing of a memorial tribute of an educational character, to bring together in a pleasant manner Ohio and New York,

“Resolved, That a committee of seven members with President William L. Strong as chairman, be appointed to confer with Chancellor MacCracken on the subject, and that power be given them to add the endorsement of the Ohio Society to such plan of the character above named as they may approve.”

President Strong subsequently appointed the following committee to act with himself in accordance with the above resolution: Hon. Whitelaw Reid, General Wager Swayne, John W. Ellis, Gen. Samuel Thomas, A. D. Juilliard, William H. Caldwell, S. S. Packard. As alternates: J. D. Archbold, C. N. Hoagland, C. S. Brice, Thomas A. Edison, John W. Harman, J. Q. A. Ward.

General Ewing gave a most interesting account of experiences in Kansas before the war, under the title, “The Struggle for Freedom in Kansas.” By resolution, the Society asked General Ewing to furnish a copy of his speech for printing.

The story of the “Ohio Field” of the University of New York is interesting, and as it is a part of the history of the Ohio Society of New York, the steps taken subsequently may be here recounted.

Upon the presentation of the above action of the Ohio Society to the council of the University, at its meeting, May 27, 1892, action was taken as follows:

“Resolved, That the council welcomes cordially the committee appointed May 9, 1892, by the Ohio Society to confer with the chancellor of the University as to the establishing of a foundation of an educational character, intended to bring together in pleasant association Ohio and New York, this committee consisting of the following fourteen gentlemen, seven being principals and seven alternates, in addition to Col. William L. Strong, president of the Ohio Society, as chairman. (Here follow the names above given.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ And the council authorizes the committee on needs and endowment, with the chancellor, to settle in conference with this committee the conditions upon which the University may be enabled to establish a trust which shall associate Ohio and New York in an important educational benefaction.”

The committee of the Ohio Society met at the Society's rooms on October 17, 1892, the following gentlemen being present: Col. William L. Strong, chairman; C. N. Hoagland, Gen. Wager Swayne, William H. Caldwell, Prof. S. S. Packard, John W. Harman. After careful consideration the following action was taken:

“The committee of the Ohio Society approve the solicitation from members of the Ohio Society, and from other Ohio men, of a fund to be given to the University of the City of New York, to aid in the purchase of new grounds selected for the University at University Heights. A new station to be established on the New York and Northern and the New York Central Railways, midway between the present stations of Morris Heights and Fordham Heights. This fund is to be given upon the conditions expressed in the following form of subscription, which is hereby approved:

“ The undersigned agree with the University of the City of New York, and with each other, that we will pay to the treasurer of the University, on or before January 1st, 1893, the amount of money set opposite to our names, respectively, upon the following conditions:

“ 1. That it may be used to secure for athletic purposes a part of the new grounds of the University of the City of New York.

“ 2. That the University agree, in case $50,000 be subscribed in like manner, that it will set apart and definitely mark, within one year after purchasing the new site, not less than four acres thereof for an athletic field.

“ 3. That this field shall be permanently named the Ohio Field.

“ 4. That if ever the University devote such land to other than athletic uses, it will invest the above amount of $50,000 in another athletic field, or in buildings, or in both, which shall bear the same name and memorial character.

“ 5. That the University further agree, for each subscription of $2,000, to found a graduate scholarship, to be named after an Ohio college such as the giver or givers may designate, which scholarship shall provide tuition to the amount of $100 a year in the University Graduate Seminary for such graduate of the college named, as its president may recommend to the Chancellor of the University. Such graduate student may hold the scholarship for three years, or until the president of the college appoint his successor, but he shall be subject to such rules as are prescribed for the other graduate students of the University. These graduate scholarships shall be perpetuated, at the least until the year 1931, which will be the centennial of the University.

“6. That the University will make full announcement in each annual catalogue of these scholarships, with their titles and conditions, and with the names of their respective founders.”

A further declaration made by the committee was as follows:

“Further, the committee of the Ohio Society suggest that subscribers, in naming Ohio colleges whose alumni may receive the graduate scholarships, may appropriately name any one of the eighteen colleges of Ohio which are admitted to membership in the Ohio College association, according to the minutes of its meeting in Columbus, December 28th, 29th, and 30th, 1891. One or more graduate scholarships in the University of the City of New York for alumni of each of these colleges will prove a most fruitful benefaction to the cause of learning. The following eighteen colleges are members of the Ohio College Association. The year of the foundation of each is given:

1. The Ohio University, at Athens, 1804.
2. The Miami University, at Oxford, 1809.
3. The Kenyon College, at Gambier, 1824.
4. The Adelbert College of the Western Reserve University, at Cleveland, 1826.
5. The Denison University, at Granville, 1832.
6. The Oberlin College, at Oberlin, 1833.
7. The Marietta College, at Marietta, 1835.
8. The Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, 1844.
9. The Wittenberg College, at Springfield, 1845.
10. The Otterbein University, at Westerville, 1847.
11. The Antioch College, at Yellow Springs, 1852.
12. The Baldwin University, at Berea, 1856.
13. The Mt. Union College, at Mt. Union, 1858.
14. The Wooster University, at Wooster, 1866.
15. The Hiram College, at Hiram, 1867.
16. The Ohio State University, at Columbus, 1870.
17. The Buchtel College, at Akron, 1870.
18. The University of Cincinnati, at Cincinnati, 1870.

The committee proceeded to point out the valuable returns certain to come from this investment of $50,000. It would aid a noble institution of learning. The Ohio Field would be a perpetual benefaction to University students who come from Ohio and other states. It would honor and benefit the city of New York, the adopted home of the donors. It would be a satisfaction to Ohioans visiting New York. Continuing, they declared:

“Equally important returns will come from the Ohio graduate scholarships. They will emphasize the true relations between universities which maintain graduate work or professional schools, and undergraduate colleges. The former should avoid taking freshmen away from the territory of the latter. They should encourage Ohio students to attend Ohio colleges. But a university in New York city may fairly invite young men who have completed undergraduate work to embrace whatever it has to offer of graduate instruction and of professional training. The Ohio graduate scholarships will say to Ohio young men: 'Go through an Ohio college; win an opportunity, if you desire, to study afterward in the metropolis.' The principle involved here may be made very fruitful in establishing better relations among American universities and colleges. Besides the effect upon the relations between colleges, each graduate scholarship may be a great benefit to some deserving student. Last year the New York University enrolled in its graduate seminary fourteen men from eleven colleges farther west than Ohio, and two men from Ohio, one from Baldwin College and one from Adelbert College. These graduate scholarships may add to these two many a young man who will be greatly helped by a year of advanced study in the metropolis."

The compiler of this record has asked Dr. MacCracken to relate the steps subsequently taken in this matter, and he has done so as follows, under date of May 6, 1905:

"On February 12, 1894, New York University credited the following gifts to Ohio men:

William L. Strong	$2,500
E. C. Bodman	2,500
A. D. Juilliard	2,500
J. D. Archbold	2,000
H. M. MacCracken	11,000
Solomon Loeb	2,500
Charles T. Barney	4,000
C. M. Hoagland, M. D.	500

Making a total of$27,500

"Further, it gave credit for an additional estimated value of certain temporary buildings at $15,000, or over.

"It further acknowledged 'An agreement entered into by Messrs. Juilliard, Strong, Bodman and Archbold on the one part and H. M. MacCracken on the other part, that the proceeds arising from the investment by these four gentlemen in a part of University Heights, North, will be paid to the University.' Whereupon, the corporation the University resolved that 'The University does hereby establish the Ohio Field according to the agreement of October, 1892, as if the entire $50,000 had been contributed.' The proceeds to be paid over will probably sum up from $8,000 to $10,000.

"The above is substantially the history of the financial side of the establishment of Ohio Field. The plan of Mr. J. Q. A. Ward for some terminal statues has not been carried out, simply because moneys have not been provided for the execution of the same under Mr. Ward's supervision. The way is still open for the setting up of these terminal statues. The Ohio Field represents an outlay for land and improvements of over $150,000."

The suggestion of Mr. Ward, as embodied in the official announcement of the Ohio Field committee was as follows: "Mr. J. Q. A. Ward, the sculptor, of whom Ohio is justly proud, when asked to help the plan of an Ohio Field, particularly by suggestion, replied that he would advise the marking off of the field from the remainder of the University campus by terminal statues, such as were set up in ancient times by Greeks and Romans. Further, he would contribute his labor in supervising the modelling of a number of terminals in simple form, giving each a plan column, ending in the head of some noted athlete of the old time—Hercules, Achilles, or the like. He would also supervise the cutting of the same out of Ohio native stone. Upon each column should appear sufficient of the leaves or berries of the buckeye or like designation to mark the Ohio origin of the monument."

The only further mention of this matter in the minutes of the Ohio Society occurs under date of October 14, 1895, when Col. W. L. Strong urged the members to attend the dedication on Saturday, October 19th, of the Ohio Field, "which had been given by members of the Ohio Society to the University of the City of New York, the chancellor of which, Dr. MacCracken, is an honored member of the Society. It was moved and seconded that Judge Higley be appointed a committee of one to make arrangements for a suitable representation of the Society at the dedication. Carried." The minutes have nothing further to say upon this matter, and Judge Higley recollects that the Society was officially represented at the exercises.

Forsaking this extended diversion into an "Ohio Field," we find that a meeting of the Society was held at Morelli's on the evening of October 17, 1892, at which a dinner complimentary to the members was served, and no business was transacted. At the gathering of November 14th it was moved by Mr. Crall that the entertainment committee be instructed to provide another dinner complimentary to the members on the occasion of the first annual meeting. Carried. Franklin Tuttle read an excellent and entertaining paper on "Oxford and Cambridge, as Seen by an Artist," for which he received the unanimous thanks of the Society. The secretary was instructed, on suggestion of General Swayne, to request the Rev. W. T. Rice, of New York, to read before the Society his paper, entitled, "Journey of a Bethlehem Boy to Ohio for his Bride in 1808."

At a meeting of the governing committee on November 29th Andrew J. C. Foyé was elected chairman for the ensuing year. The annual meeting of the Society was held at Morelli's on the same night. A dinner was served. President W. L. Strong occupied the chair. Speeches were made by the president and by General Henry L. Burnett, David Homer Bates, L. C. Hopkins, Thomas Ewing, Jr., John D. Archbold and Robert W. Tayler. From the report of the governing committee it appeared that twenty-seven new members had been enrolled during the year, and that only one death had occurred. The treasurer's report showed a cash balance on hand of $2,571.90. The annual election was then held and resulted in the choice of the following officers: President, William L. Strong; vice-presidents, Henry L. Burnett, J. Q. A. Ward, Silas S. Packard, Milton I. Southard and John Dickson; secretary, William Ford Upson; recording secretary, Thomas Ewing, Jr.; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees for three years, A. D. Juilliard, George P. Tangeman and John W. Stout.*

At the meeting of December 12th it was ordered that five additional members be added to the entertainment committee to form a banquet committee, the five to be appointed by the chair. The president then introduced D. C. Beard, who gave an address on "The Anatomy of an Angel."

The proceedings at the meeting of the Society on February 13, 1893, were of so important a nature, and the speeches made were so eloquent and full of valuable information, that they were taken in full stenographically at the time. The result was a small monograph, published by order of the Society, upon the cover of which are these terse descriptive words: "An Ohio Night." The title page was as follows:

PROCEEDINGS
OF THE
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRESENTATION BY ITS PRESIDENT, COLONEL WILLIAM L. STRONG,
OF THE
PORTRAIT OF GEN. W. T. SHERMAN

AT THE CLUB HOUSE, 236 FIFTH AVENUE
FEBRUARY 13, 1893.

* There is no record in the minute book of this annual meeting of November 29, 1892, except in a brief printed extract from the New York Tribune, pasted in and endorsed "Approved, Dec. 12th." There is no attest to the records of the meeting of December 12th. After the meeting of December 12th there appear in the book three blank pages, and the next meeting recorded is that of March 13, 1893. It is noted in that meeting of March that the minutes of December 12th, January 13th and February 13th were read and approved; but there were no minutes for the two dates last named in the book. The proceedings of two of these meetings must, therefore, remain a blank in this record.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Opposite this page was a handsome reproduction of the portrait of General Sherman, which became the property of the Society on that night.

The proceedings of the evening were as follows: President W. L. Strong was in the chair. After the reading of the minutes had been dispensed with the president said: "The next business will be the consideration of resolutions which have been moved by the Society in memory of ex-President Hayes, who was an honored non-resident member of this Society, and who has passed away since our last meeting. I have asked Judge Higley to prepare these resolutions and he will now read them; after which any remarks will be in order." The resolutions, as read by Judge Higley, were as follows:

"The Ohio Society of New York, since its last meeting, has met with a great loss in the death of the Hon. Rutherford B. Hayes, one of its earliest and most distinguished members. After a brief illness he passed away, at his home in Fremont, Ohio, on the 17th day of January, 1893, in the seventy-second year of his age. Successful young lawyer, city solicitor of Cincinnati, the metropolis of Ohio, major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and then brigadier-general in the late war of the rebellion, twice elected to Congress, and thrice governor of his native state, President of the United States—honored citizen of the republic!

"In every position of public trust to which he was called, he served the people and the nation with that distinguished ability and unwavering fidelity which result from lofty purpose, masterful industry, and unquestioned integrity.

"His broad sympathies found forceful expression in noble, persevering efforts for the downtrodden, the poor and distressed, for the reform of prison management throughout the world, and for the promotion of virtue, peace, prosperity and happiness among mankind.

"His private life was as simple and pure and beautiful as his public career was honored and illustrious. His memory will grow brighter and more hallowed with time, and future generations will pay homage to his rare worth.

"Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York extend its sincerest sympathy to the bereaved family in their great sorrow, and that a copy hereof be forwarded to them.

"Respectfully submitted,

"WARREN HIGLEY, Committee."

Gen. Wager Swayne moved the adoption of the resolutions, and in doing so said: "Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: Having been at the funeral of General Hayes, I will say a word about it. Beginning with the statement which I am sure will find its response in your own hearts that, while if I know myself I loved our friend who has passed away, at the same time, searching my heart, I have found no reason to be ashamed of the fact that it was not in me, it was not the uppermost feeling in my heart, to grieve over the fact of his death. I had seen him age ten years in as many weeks after his wife's death, and sweetly and patiently and manfully and truly as he bore it all, knowing, nevertheless, how sure he was of presently being with her again, and how very anxious he was that that might be, I feel freer, as I think it will be a relief to some of you at least to feel entirely free to say in your own hearts, as I said in mine, 'I thank Thee, for Thy servant departed this life in Thy faith and in Thy fear.' It was a matter of sincere rejoicing that such a life had been ended so completely, and without a blemish. There is an ancient adage, 'Call no man happy until he is dead,' and if ever that adage had an application, practical and certain, within the cognizance of our own lives, it was then and there.

"When we got out to the funeral, it was touching to see very much such a concourse of people as had been assembled at the time of the death of his wife. When ten thousand people gathered in Fremont on the occasion of the death of Mrs. Hayes, it was not to celebrate the death of a great man in the affairs of state, but it was a tribute to personal worth and loveliness of high and rare degree. The same concourse, at least of the same character, seemed to me to be gathered out of neighborly feeling to pay the same sort of tribute to that same sort of attributes that, if you will pardon me, I find and enjoy here among you, and that we find and enjoy among ourselves here, if I rightly understand it.

"Now when it came to his being laid away and we were allowed to pass by and look into his coffin, there was nothing sad there. The features had taken a fixed look which gave their dominant aspect a larger prominence than is found in the mobile play of countenance of the living. The face had a fixed look, but there was nothing doleful about that, for all that look was peace, and those of us who knew him, those of us who cared for him, those of us who cared to remember him, those who knew him with less intimacy and yet cared for him and cared to cherish a fixed idea, will fix in our own hearts and carry as our permanent recollection of the man that he went out of this world in peace."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The president called attention to the fact that Col. William L. Tidball, a member, had passed away since the last meeting. Homer Lee gave an extended account of Colonel Tidball's career, and on motion of General Swayne a committee was appointed to prepare resolutions in honor of his memory. Said committee consisted of General Swayne, Homer Lee and A. J. C. Foyé.

The president then called S. S. Packard to the chair. On assuming it that gentleman said: "Colonel Strong has called me to this chair, and so I obey, because he is my superior officer, and because it is one of the rules of the Ohio Society that subalterns must obey their superior officers. Besides, as we all see, the colonel has the rheumatism, and I am the only vice-president in the room. There is at least that much fitness in it; but being here, what am I to do? We have been told, with some iteration and not a little impressiveness, that this is to be a surprise party; and since I have been here and had a chance to nose around a little, I learn that everybody is to be surprised, except Colonel Strong and Brother Foyé (and the people whom he has employed to help him keep the secret), and Homer Lee, and the announced speakers, and a few other members whose nerves were not strong enough to bear the strain. Especially is it to be a surprise to me. When I was called to the chair I thought that might be it; but have since concluded not. I thought possibly my friends might desire to give me a surprise similar to the one given to Bill Nye by the Clover Club of Philadelphia. The Clover Club, as you know, makes a practice of calling men to their feet in order to 'guy' them down. Bill was invited to attend one of their dinners, and he went prepared to withstand their jibes. He shut his teeth tightly together, and fortified himself in every way, and went on with his speech. It was very funny, but nobody laughed. Nobody moved, even; but all sat quietly in their seats as solemn as owls: and when he got through and waited for applause, there was simply funereal silence. He was the only surprised person in the room. I beg to say that, knowing this story, I am not to be caught with any such bait. All the same, I find the position a very awkward one, and I am going to get out of it by calling upon a person who is already 'in it,' and whom you are always delighted to hear. I will ask our beloved friend and ex-president, General Swayne, to touch the button in his own way. Ladies and gentlemen, General Swayne."

Gen. Wager Swayne: "Ladies and Gentlemen:—The only surprise I am quite sure that I have in store for you is that which comes to us all the time when our esteemed and valued friend, Colonel Strong, has something for us. On this occasion he has commissioned me to present to the Society in his name and in his behalf a portrait of our late honorary member, Gen. William T. Sherman. (Portrait unveiled amid long-continued applause.) This is a portrait for which he made repeated sittings, and the details of which were personally supervised by himself with much interest. The interest of the painting, however, does not stop there. That picture was painted by Mr. James H. Beard, one of our oldest and most valued fellow-members, one of whose sons we remember with much affectionate regard, and to another of whose sons we are indebted for a recent lecture on 'The Anatomy of an Angel,' so highly entertaining and instructive that it causes all of us a great deal of pleasure to recall it. Nothing, therefore, could more fully identify this Society than that present. It is the work of a member of the Society, a distinguished artist. It is the gift of the president of this Society, to whom we are continually indebted. It represents a man as highly honored and as valued in Ohio as any man who ever lived there; a man who did as much as any one man to identify Ohio with the well-being and the glory of the nation, and it stands to us like the picture of a mountain near which we have lived, whose scenery is dear to us, and whose later story is a part of the history of the country. More than that, ladies and gentlemen, the picture stands to us as in a sense peculiarly the embodiment of the state. The state gave the artist to the country, the state gave our president to the country and gave him to this city, gave him to us. Through the artist and the president, the state gave us the picture. The state likewise gave us this Society—the state brought us together. Besides that, we may say the state gave General Sherman to the country. I am glad to see that you applaud that sentiment—sincerely glad, because in the course of the history of this Society, and in discussing the status of this Society with others, the question arises continually, what did the state do? The answer is ready and complete. What did the state do for General Sherman? The answer is, what the state did for us, and if we want to know what the state did for us, you may treat the question in the converse, that what the state did for us is to be seen by what the state did for him. If we want to know what the state did for him, the answer is very simple again. What did free institutions do for that man? What have free institutions done for us? The two great distinctive characteristics of that man were his loyalty to the Union of these states and his military prowess. What did the state do for his loyalty to the Union of these states? What effect shall we ascribe to the fact that that great chieftain was born where to be born meant hope and opportunity? That he lived where to live gives life, the energy of freedom, and where to die admits of opportunities in contemplation of the future of our loved ones. Those are the things that the state does for us. That is the measure of our Society to the dead. We may treat it as a fact to which we are alive, or we may treat it as a debt of no consequence to us, but if we treat it as a debt of no consequence to us, the inquiry is pertinent, who is it that is dead? The state or we? Who is it that is dead? The state? The state yet lives. The state that still gives hope and opportunity to you, that still gives the strength and activity of security to manhood for those we leave behind. Is it the state that is dead, or is it the man to whom those things are dead as being of no present consequence to him? I submit to you, ladies and gentlemen, that it is the state that lives, the state that is our environment, the state that within the recollection of some of us and the state that in the history of that man determined whether or not he should be loyal to the Union of these states, or whether he should be like other men of great ability in other states who thought the Union of these states only a rope of sand. Let me say a word to you there. I hope it is not irrelevant, as to the difference—not the difference, but the distinctive line between the state and the United States. We are apt to ignore that difference, yet it is constantly of practical value to us in forming an intelligent knowledge of current events. The distinction lies here. The United States takes charge of interstate and international relations. The state takes charge of all those relations of person and property on which we build our homes, our fortunes, and our hopes. The states are like a checkered floor upon a concrete basis. They get their strength and support from the insoluble and indisputable union lying beneath them for that with which we come in personal daily contact, that upon which the eye rests, upon whose smoothness and cleanliness we depend for the accuracy and the convenience and the decency of daily life. Those squares with which we are immediately concerned, those are the states. It is the state with which we are concerned continually in our daily life. It is the state that echoes to our daily happiness, it is the state that determines the future disposition of our property, and it is the state and not the United States through which we exert all those humanitarian endeavors which do so much for the amelioration of mankind in our vicinity. It is the state that supplies and sustains our immediate environment. It seems not too much to say that the state has more to do with the formation of our individual character, with its determination and maintenance, almost more to do with it than has any one individual with whom we come in contact. Now our state produced this chieftain. What shall we say of him? What man has shed more lustre on the recent history of his country? No man, I may say, was ever more thoroughly identified with our state. Among its early settlers was his father in the north. Among its early settlers in the south was the father of his wife—two great men in that land. His father was one of the early judges of the Supreme Court of Ohio, a man of great excellence and worth; his wife's father was the greatest man, perhaps, Ohio ever produced—the Hon. Thomas Ewing—and his father had come with that immortal band who founded the state of Ohio and founded the Northwest Territory and secured and controlled thereby the freedom and the prevalence of universal freedom in these United States under the shield of the ordinance of 1787. That man grew up under these auspices; grew up in the state of Ohio. It is enough to say that when the country came to determine the question of its own union, his life was nothing with him. There was no weak joint in the armor of his loyalty. The spirit that was in him repelled every suggestion of secession. No matter where he was, though he was in Louisiana, there was no man in Ohio whose loyalty was more unquestioned, and from that time on to the conclusion of the great war and to the close of his life, there was no man who more steadily acquired or held in greater degree, or held with greater certainty, the respect and veneration of the people of the United States than Gen. William T. Sherman. (Applause.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ Now I have stated to you that this man, this chieftain, was to us—the very picture of this chieftain was to us like the picture of a mountain near which we had lived, with whose scenery we were familiar and which was identified with all our love of country. More than that. This man not only did we live near to, but he lived near to us, and he taught me—he taught many a man, and he may teach all of us, an invaluable lesson of self-respect. He was no hypocrite. He was no fool. And being neither hypocrite nor fool, great as he was, he saw no inequality between himself and me or you. It was not condescension on his part that he loved us. Either there was that in his nature which saw something worthy of respect in us and that was fit to be loved, or else his life was one long, broad, continuing mistake, because he cared for us. When he came here he cared for us all. When we met him singly at his house he cared for us individually.

“ I travelled once with him three weeks at a time. We met hundreds and hundreds of men. I never saw a man for whom he did not care. I never saw him meet a man in whom he did not take a genuine, spontaneous interest, and there was no condescension about it. Either his whole life was a continuing mistake, or there was that in all the people that he met deserving his regard. I think I sincerely loved and venerated him, but I prefer to think that he found that in me which was worthy his regard, though I cannot see it myself. I prefer to think that he found that in me which was worthy his regard rather than to think of him as continually purblind or condescending, because condescending I know he was not. It was not in him. I prefer to ascribe his regard for you and for me and for the people whom he met to a great-hearted penetration which looked over, because he was so great, and looked through, because he was so clear. I prefer that you and I should think that that was the true lesson of his life, that there is in every one of us the essence of a godlike manhood and of womanhood that is divine, that found in that great heart a recognition that, great as it was, was yet not greater than the truth.

“ Before taking my seat, I will take the liberty of moving that a committee of three be appointed to prepare resolutions expressing the thanks of the Society to our president for this generous gift and our appreciation of it.” Motion prevailed.

The Chairman: “ Before naming the members of this committee, the chair will assume to speak for the Society in calling upon General Ewing for some remarks.”

Gen. Thomas Ewing: “ General Swayne and Ladies and Gentlemen: On behalf of the Ohio Society, I accept this valuable gift. It is one of especial interest to us in the fact that it was painted by a member of our Society, who won fame before the war in Cincinnati, which was then, as it is now, one of the art centres of the Western world, and who came on here seeking a wider field and larger opportunities. We miss his genial and venerable presence to-night, as we have missed it too often at our meetings of late. I am sure you will all join me in the hope that his four-score years will not cut us off from his attendance at many a meeting to come.

“ In 1854, or about that year, he painted a portrait in pastel of Minnie Sherman, the baby daughter of General Sherman, now Mrs. Fitch, of Pittsburgh. It was a faithful and fascinating likeness. The child was beautiful, and the mode of the artist, the material with which he wrought, and the manner in which he wrought—which was by rubbing the crayon on the canvas with the finger—seemed to give a transparency to the complexion which you never see in life except in a girl baby, and rarely ever see in a portrait painted in oil. It still hangs in the parlors of a member of our family, admired by all who have seen it for forty years past.

“ This portrait of General Sherman now presented to our Society is, I understand, the last for which he ever sat, and the latest work—I hope not the last—of the distinguished artist. He and General Sherman knew each other in youth. Both started out from Southern Ohio, Beard animated by the gentle love of art, Sherman by the ruder instinct of war. Each ran a splendid career; and both met here in old age as members of the Ohio Society, one of them having achieved distinction, the other immortality.

“ This portrait is of a special interest to us also in the fact that it comes to the Society unsolicited from the ever-generous hand of our president. It marks his admiration for one of the greatest of Ohio's sons, and it marks, too, the big-hearted generosity which impelled him to seek out the old artist in his almost abandoned studio and pay him a large price for his noble work. I accept it on behalf of the Society because of the love with which it is bestowed, because of the superb art with which it is wrought, because of the incomparable genius which it perpetuates and commemorates.

“ The history of General Sherman is part of the history of his country and of mankind. He has been for half a generation one of the idols of the world; and unlike most idols, he never received honor that he did not deserve. Great as is his fame, it has grown only out of great achievements; there is no varnish or veneer upon it—it is solid from centre to circumference.

“ General Sherman was of a highly nervous organization, and was often fitful and wayward, but only in light and trivial matters. When it came to anything of consequence to his fellowmen, or to the country, he was as firm and unshaken as the still depths of the sea. Throughout his life, as boy, as cadet, as young soldier, as husband, father, friend, citizen, in every relation of life, he was as constant as that northern star

Of whose true-fixed and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament.

“ I do not claim for General Sherman that he was the first captain of the war. He did not claim, or even admit, that distinction as due to him. He always conceded to Grant the place at the top of the pedestal. He may have been wrong; he may have been too modest—many people think he was—but the general judgment of the Northern people assigns pre-eminence to Grant. Grant first—Sherman second—and it does not seem probable that history will disturb this opinion of the relative merits of these great commanders.

“ But there was one supreme virtue in which I think Sherman was unequalled, in which I know he was unsurpassed, and that was in absolute unselfish patriotism. Illustrations of this virtue extend from the beginning to the end of his public career. The year before the war broke out he was engaged in the most delightful employment he had ever had, with a large salary, as Superintendent of the Military Academy at Alexandria, La. When that state took the first step in the general direction of secession, instantly, without a moment's hesitation or consultation with anybody, General Sherman resigned his place, returned North, and took a position in a petty street railroad company in St. Louis. I myself stood by when President Lincoln, before the first battle of Bull Run, tendered him the position of brigadier-general in the regular army. He declined it and asked to be appointed to no higher place than colonel—on the ground that in his opinion there were other men who were better fitted for the high command than he. When he had held his first prominent command at Louisville, soon after the outbreak of the war, he lost it because he bluntly told Secretary Cameron—that which he, and he alone, then clearly saw—that it would require 200,000 men to take and hold the strategic lines in Kentucky and Tennessee. Cameron degraded him—by assigning him to a petty duty as inspector at Sedalia, in Missouri—but Sherman went instantly to his post and performed his new duties with zeal, and never a murmur of complaint escaped his lips.

“ When he was at the head of the army in Washington, after the war, during President Grant's administration, he was living in comfort and luxury in a mansion presented to him by admiring friends—General of the Army, holding a higher rank than Washington ever held, or anybody but Grant ever held; but he was driven out of Washington. Why? Because General Belknap, then secretary of war, had demanded that he should place on his staff a cadet just graduated from West Point, and send back to his regiment a veteran of the war who on twenty battlefields had earned the high and coveted staff position. Sherman refused to displace the veteran and thus to set a bad example to the army. He quietly accepted the penalty, broke up his house in Washington, sold his furniture, and went back to St. Louis.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“When we came to reorganize the armies of the United States, he had been restored to his place at Washington. He was then nearly sixty years old, in full health and vigor, intellectually and physically. He believed that it was best for the service to fix a precise age at which every officer should be retired. The Army Bill was so prepared, and sixty-four fixed as the age of retirement. But Democrats and Republicans alike, in the military committees of the senate and of the house, unanimously determined that General Sherman should be made an exception to the rule of retirement. He refused to be made an exception. That position as general was dearer to him than almost any position was to almost any officer, civil or military, in the country; for the army was his idol, and the position at the head of it was the aim and realization of his highest ambition. The presidency had no charm for him. Nothing was so high as the place he held. He was as fit to command then as ever, and seemed likely to preserve his intellectual and physical activity for at least ten or fifteen years. His friends and family begged him to accept the proffered exemption. They believed it would add many years to his life. He believed it too; but he was inexorable. He insisted on accepting for himself the rule that was imposed with his assent on his subordinate officers. Think of it, and point me to a parallel in the history of our country! Grand as was the example of Washington in rejecting the third term of the presidency and in declining the renewed command of the army, his self-sacrifice was far less marked than Sherman's, if it could be considered self-sacrifice at all. Washington longed for repose and retirement, while Sherman loved action, conspicuity and command. By insisting on the common lot of retirement, Sherman cut himself off from a large part of his needed income and from all the delightful occupations of his high station. I think there is not another instance among our public men of such stern and patriotic self-sacrifice. In common affairs of life he was as selfish as the average man, but when it came to a question between him and the public service, he did not know himself, he did not consider himself. He sacrificed and forgot himself. That's the sort of stuff real heroes are made of. There is no true heroism in service, however brilliant, or in talent, however commanding, if the spirit be sordid and selfish. Useless is the example of genius which excites the wonder of mankind, if accompanied by the grasping and greed of Marlborough, or the self-centred egotism of Napoleon. It is only the Christ-like spirit of self-sacrifice which, when joined with great service and great character, causes the heart of youth to leap and soar in noble emulation. Such was Sherman's character. His is and will be an example to American youth forever and forever, as one of the greatest of generals, the most unselfish of patriots, the noblest of men.” (Much applause.)

The Chairman: “Ladies and Gentlemen: I am sure the question will never be asked again, ‘For what was the Ohio Society formed?’ ‘What does it represent?' It seems to me that to-night there can be no question that we have shown one of its great purposes. This is an occasion that we are not likely to forget: an occasion which I am thankful to know is going on record. There are others in the room from whom we would like to hear; and still we are not to forget the fact that a presentation has been made by our honored president, and that some remarks have been made thereon; and it seems to me entirely proper that he should be called to his feet. (Applause and calls for Colonel Strong.) I will ask Colonel Strong to respond to this call."

Colonel Strong: "Mr. Chairman: I thought I had got sufficient talent to talk for me this evening without being called upon to say anything, and I know there are two or three gentlemen here who want to make a few remarks. I want to say just this in reference to the picture. This portrait was painted by an Ohioan and of an Ohioan, each about equally distinguished; for Mr. Beard, the artist, stands about at the head of his profession in certain lines of art, and you know General Sherman stood at the head of the military genius of the world.

"I think General Ewing was a little modest in his reference to the two military characters, Grant and Sherman. They were both Ohio men. It is hardly necessary for us to draw a comparison between the two, but I am well satisfied myself that the world and the future historian will put General Sherman as the master of military tactics and the superior of any military man that has existed in this century, and perhaps ever in the world. Bonaparte bears no comparison as a military chieftain to him—and I doubt very much if the celebrated Von Moltke can compare at all with General Sherman. The field that Sherman fought over was different from the field that any military man has ever fought over in the Christian era. There never has been anything just like it, so that it is impossible to compare the labors and the military tactics of Sherman with that of any military general on record, so that you must accept just what was done by Sherman.

"Now having this veneration for General Sherman myself, being an Ohio man as he was, having his portrait painted by an Ohio man, and knowing that it was to be sold, it made me feel that that painting should belong to the Ohio Society. There was no other place for it. There could be no other place for it. He could not manufacture a place for it in his own state or in New York state better than right here in the Ohio Society, and when that Society goes out of existence, I expect that it will be returned to my heirs, or their heirs. I trust it will never go out of existence, but if it should, I want it placed on record that the portrait goes to my heirs." (Applause.)

The Chairman: "In the discharge of his duty, the chairman would name as the committee on resolutions covering this gift Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Henry L. Burnett and Hon. Mahlon Chance; and in order that the full signi-fiance of this appointment may appear, I am sure the Society would be glad to hear from General Burnett."

The Chairman: "The meeting will be glad to hear from General Burnett."

Gen. H. L. Burnett: "Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: After listening to the noble and touching addresses of General Swayne and General Ewing, no unpremeditated words of mine can add to the interest or charm of this occasion. This is not a time to attempt a fair admeasurement of the superb merit of General Sherman; but we come to acknowledge the beautiful tribute to his memory by our worthy president, affording an opportunity which is inspiring. Ohio has given to the fame of the ages a Grant, a Sherman, a Sheridan. They are not to be contrasted or compared. History cannot be written, or patriotism illustrated, without their names. It is not the grandeur of princes or blaze of thrones that makes the glory of this world. Great men, great names, great deeds are the jewels that light up the dark passages of human history. General Sherman was a great man—one of earth's noblest, truest, gentlest, best. He was an ideal soldier, the idol of those who followed the feathery fringe of the skirmish smoke, winning victories along the advancing lines as they marched with him from 'Atlanta to the sea,' and when the final triumph came, the vanquished honored him for the generous spirit which diplomacy deemed too magnanimous. He alone of all the great military heroes was absolutely without political ambitions and turned away from the blandishments of place and power. He was a man of trained faculties, accurate knowledge, and remarkable personality; but above all a loving and lovable man. Soldier, patriot, citizen! He needs no shadowy canvas, no enduring bronze, no sculptured marble. Nothing we can say or do, nothing the world may say or do, can mar, shadow, or change the fame his own genius won.

"Mr. Chairman, allow me to express my appreciation of the generous and splendid gift of Colonel Strong, and in so doing voice the sentiment of every member of the Society. In honoring General Sherman he has honored Ohio, and endeared himself to every loyal and patriotic heart."

The Chairman: "The occasion is complete as it stands, but I feel sure that there are others present who might esteem it a favor to render a personal tribute to the gift and to the giver. And surely, as it seems to me, there should be a motion looking to the publication of the proceedings of this evening. The chair will be glad to entertain such a motion."

Judge Warren Higley: "Mr. Chairman, taking up your suggestion, which seems to me an exceedingly appropriate one, it gives me pleasure to move you, sir, that the records of the eloquent and admirable addresses to which we have been permitted to listen to-night, as well as the expression of opinion, none too strong, that has been manifested for the person who has given us this magnificent gift, be made a permanent record of this Society, and that it be printed for distribution." The motion prevailed.

Mr. Lee: "Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ewing, Jr., has a pleasant incident about this painting that I am sure you would like to hear."

The Chairman: "We are always glad to hear from Mr. Ewing; and this evening particularly so."

Thomas Ewing, Jr.: "The artist related a very pretty story about this picture when I saw it in his studio a year or so ago. It appears that General Sherman—an old friend of the painter, the friendship dating long before the war—had often promised to sit for him. A warm feeling of admiration and comradeship at length moved the artist to write to the general, asking a fulfillment of his promise. He received in answer a rather hastily written and formal reply, saying:

"Dear Mr. Beard: My engagements are so many that I cannot give you the sittings you ask."

"Two or three days after that, as the artist was sitting in his studio, he heard a tap on the door and, the door being thrown open, a brawny hand was thrust in, grasping that of Mr. Beard, while the general's voice was heard to say: 'Beard, old fellow, I've treated you badly! Of course I will sit to you for my picture.' And notwithstanding the general's well-known restless disposition, he gave him the sittings required, remaining with exemplary patience and self-control in the same position for two hours at a time. The general expressed himself highly gratified with the result."

The Chairman: "There has been a request to hear from Mr. Holloway, and the chair strongly seconds it."

Mr. J. F. Holloway: "I have not the remotest idea where such a request came from. I certainly would like to see the person who made it. There is, however, one thought that has been in my mind while I have been sitting here and listening to what has been so well said; and that is, that somehow or other we have been made to feel as if we had been brought in touch with important times and important events. As we have listened to speakers who from personal knowledge have given us fragments of unwritten history in which the great men of the Republic were actors, who have repeated to us conversations they themselves had listened to, as they stood beside Lincoln and Sherman, we seem to be carried back to the scenes of those great events which still stir all who remember them. Somehow, it has seemed as if we were witnessing the closing scene of some great drama. Already many of the important actors have made their exit, while a few still linger on the stage, the descending curtain of which will soon hide all forever. To those of us who lived through the days about which we have heard so much to-night everything seems real and impressive—to the young people here all this is only tradition or history; but I doubt not it will ever be a pleasant memory to them to have been here, and to have listened to the splendid encomiums that have been pronounced, not only on General Sherman, whose portrait is before us, but as well on the great heroes with whom he was so closely associated in the past."

A general call for the chairman.

Mr. Packard: "The chairman was placed here to attend to the duties of the position, one of the most positive of which is not to make a speech. And yet he would give more than he is likely ever to possess to be able to do it. Really, I am full of it—that is, of the desire. But the speech that is in me is wordless. I regret it, for I would like you to know what is passing in my mind. I think I can trust myself to say, however, that this is one of the great occasions of the Society, and will be remembered hereafter as presenting in the best form its most valuable functions. Not only have we been presented with an invaluable souvenir—hereafter to adorn our walls—but we have done appropriate honor to the memory of the distinguished dead who were once of our number. And who are these distinguished dead? One, a modest citizen of our state, who did honor to his birthright and to his country in peace and in war; another, who was not only great as a private citizen, but who served honorably upon the field when his country was in peril; became the governor of his state, President of the United States, and was ever known as a man of large heart and unblemished character. And lastly, we have again had occasion to bring before loyal hearts the memory of our greatest hero, and to learn from those who knew him most intimately the delightful things that made up his strong personality. And it is not improper that we should ask ourselves who are these friends—of his and ours—who have made this occasion memorable? Members of his family, companions of his childhood, compatriots in arms, honorable and worthy men who have helped to make the history of the country, and who are the bulwarks of this Society.

"When we speak of Sherman, how naturally we think of Swayne and Ewing and Burnett. Can we, in fact, estimate this occasion beyond its historic value? Are we likely to have an occasion more worthy of preservation as a reason for the existence of the Ohio Society?"

Following this report in the "Ohio Night" monograph, came this appreciation of James H. Beard:

"The hope expressed by General Ewing that the portrait of General Sherman, although the latest, was not the last, of the eminent artist, and that there yet remained for him many years of usefulness, was destined not to be realized; for within two short months thereafter he left his work, and is now on the list of the illustrious dead; and it is peculiarly fitting that his last ambitious work should be a portrait of his great friend, and that it should be in the possession of the Ohio Society.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“James H. Beard was born in Buffalo, N. Y., May 20, 1812. His predilection for art was manifest in early childhood: at first in the form of charcoal and chalk sketches on kitchen walls and chair bottoms, and eventually with home-made brushes and personally prepared paint on personally prepared canvas, reaching up to the ambitious achievement of portraits of living people, done at five dollars a head, and cheap at that. While he was yet a boy his parents removed to Painesville, Ohio, and here it was that he entered upon his great career. He bought some cotton cloth, coated it with white lead for canvas, made his own stretchers, tacking the canvas thereon; went to the stone-cutter for his grinding stone; smoothed it himself; made a muller for grinding the colors; constructed his own easel and palette; selected the bristles and hair for his brushes, and put them together, and went to work.

“For his first portraits he charged three dollars, then raised to five, and eventually to ten. Years afterward he charged considerably more—and got it. In his early manhood he went to Cincinnati, where he entered upon his career, and attained to great distinction as an artist. For his sitters he had such distinguished men as Henry Clay, John Quincy Adams and William Henry Harrison. One of the best portraits of Harrison, painted from life in 1838, is now at the studio of his son in this city. He was specially distinguished as an animal painter, putting into the faces, attitudes and actions of his figures human attributes, making the picture tell its own story.”

The eighth annual banquet of the Ohio Society was given at Delmonico's on the evening of February 18, 1893. The following gentlemen served as the committee in charge: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; Homer Lee, secretary; Leander H. Crall, treasurer; Wager Swayne, Thomas Ewing, Calvin S. Brice, A. D. Juilliard, William L. Brown, H. A. Glassford, Andrew J. C. Foyé, D. H. Bates, C. G. Harraman, R. W. Tayler. There were about two hundred in attendance. The decoration of the room consisted only of a conspicuous display of the American flag and the coat of arms of the state of Ohio.

William L. Strong, president of the Society, occupied the centre chair at the table of honor. At his left sat Secretary of the Interior Hon. John W. Noble, and at his right Congressman Michael D. Harter of the Buckeye state. Others at the table were General Wager Swayne, Chancellor Henry M. MacCracken, of the University of the state of New York; ex-Governor James E. Campbell, Gen. Thomas Ewing, C. C. Beaman, representing the New England Society; Ellis H. Roberts, the St. David's Society; John Sloane, the St. Andrew's Society; John D. Crimmins, the St. Patrick's Society; Augustus Van Wyck, the Holland Society; R. D. Benedict, the Vermont Society, and Hon. Beriah Wilkins, member of Congress from Ohio.

Mr. Strong, as toastmaster, introduced as the first speaker John W. Noble, who spoke for “Ohio Men in the Cabinet.” This toast it had been expected would be responded to by the secretary of the treasury, Charles Foster, but, as Secretary Noble explained, his associate was undergoing a "gold cure"* treatment, and was unable to be present. Secretary Noble paid a tribute to the original strain of the line of ancestry of all Ohioans and of William McKinley, the governor of Ohio, in particular, the mentioning of whose name was met with a great burst of applause. It was expected that Governor McKinley would be a guest at the dinner, but at the last moment he was obliged to cancel the engagement.

The "Annexation of Territory and the Admission of States" was responded to by Hon. Michael D. Harter. A humorous speech was furnished by Frederic Taylor in response to the toast, "The Cosmopolitan Metropolis." It was cosmopolitan in its quality and dramatic in its rendering. Mr. Taylor indulged in spurts of dialect imitation, which were greatly appreciated.

Ex-Governor Campbell, of Ohio, responded to the toast "The Sons of Ohio." He said in part: "In the absence of that distinguished man who now presides over the great state of Ohio, the Ohio Society has called upon me to say something about the sons of Ohio. You all know how great the sons of Ohio are. You all know that they combine the qualities of the religious New Englanders, the old Dutchmen of New York, the Quakers of Pennsylvania and the aristocratic Englishmen of Virginia. The sons of Ohio are the greatest and grandest people on the earth. Ohio furnished many of the greatest heroes of the war; Ohio's sons have filled every important position in the Federal government, and to-day there is no better, grander and more useful person than a son of Ohio."

Gen. Willard Warner, of Tennessee, followed ex-Governor Campbell. He spoke of "Ohio as a State." The last speaker of the evening was C. C. Beaman. He responded to the toast, "The Other Societies."

The menu card consisted of three large square cards tied at the top corner with a scarlet silk ribbon. On the front at the top was a handsome steel engraving of the new coat of arms of the state of New York. At the bottom corner appeared the arms of the state of Ohio, with the motto, "Imperium in Imperio" (An Empire within an Empire). On the inside leaf was the menu, surrounded by various legends. On the reverse page at the top was a steel-line engraving of Washington, underneath which was a scarf on which were inscribed the words, "Ordinance of 1787," and below this his famous reply to his soldiers at Valley Forge, when their defeat seemed certain, and they asked what was to be done: "If we are overpowered, we will retire to the Valley of the Ohio, and there we will be free." At the bottom of the last page was a vignette, "The Building of the Empire," which represented a Marietta pioneer felling trees, oxen hauling logs to build the first house in the settlement, which appears in the distance. The menu card graphically illustrated the progress of the state from its small beginning to its present greatness.

Under date of March 13, 1893, there is an entry in the minutes of the recording secretary which says: "The governing committee report the Society as in flourishing condition; plenty of money in the treasury, and not a dollar of indebtedness. The membership is gradually increasing, with flattering prospects of large additions from the efforts of General Swayne's recruiting committee, and also from the ardent circular letter that accompanies the new manual now being sent out,* in which it is kindly suggested that each and every member use the blank applications that go with it in adding at least one or more to our membership, resident or non-resident.

"The committee appointed to secure permanent quarters for the Society, after a thorough canvass of the situation, comparing carefully location, eligibility, accommodations offered, amount of rent, etc., came to the unanimous conclusion that, on the terms they could obtain the present quarters or premises, it was decidedly best to secure them for a term of years, which they have done, taking them for five years at a yearly rental of $1,800 per annum, $600 per year less than formerly paid. This eliminates the trouble and expense of moving, refurnishing and fitting up, and also preserves our identity of location, which is very important. We have become known and established here, and as our first and only home for these many years much that is memorable and dear to us is associated with these rooms. In fact, the traditions of our Society almost entirely cluster about this spot. It is proposed to put the rooms in good repair, make them bright and cheerful, and the committee hope that members and their friends will use them freely and frequently."

Dr. MacCracken made a very pleasant speech on the subject, "On a Change of Chaplain."

The minutes tersely declare that the evening of April 10th "was devoted to fun; many speeches were made; no business was transacted." May 8th was ladies' night. Mr. Marion and Mr. Miller entertained the Society with two very interesting original papers entitled, "The Little So-

* The following is no doubt the letter referred to:

"The Ohio Society of New York respectfully asks from persons who are eligible to its membership attention to its aims. So long as the Society was in any sense an experiment this was not done. It is now in its seventh year, was never more prosperous, and has never been without sustained and active interest in its purpose, or without sufficient means. It has now a settled home, tried methods, and a demonstrated value to its members. This last is amply vouched for by its personnel. It offers to young men lately from Ohio an opportunity for acquaintance. To older persons it supplies renewed familiarity with their own earlier life. For all its members it preserves the sense of individual history and enlarges the scope of personal cordiality. As a whole it contributes both here and in Ohio to the honor of the state, and in so doing pays a debt which by increasing patriotism enriches the community. To share these things, and to contribute to them, is what this invitation proffers to those to whom it is addressed.

"For the Society, the membership committee, by cialist," and "A Thafe and a Robber." Refreshments were served. On June 12th an adjournment was taken until the second Monday in October.

The first regular meeting after the summer vacation was held at Morelli's restaurant on October 9, 1893. Dinner was served. The special subject for discussion was the representation of the Society on "Manhattan Day," October 21st, at the World's Fair. Speeches were made by President Strong, Vice-Presidents Burnett, Packard, Southard and others.

The chairman of the governing committee reported an active interest in the affairs of the Society among officers and members. The following gentlemen were appointed a committee to report at the next meeting nominations of officers for the ensuing year: George B. Hibbard, chairman; Franklin Tuttle, C. G. Harraman, E. L. Prentiss, John W. Stout, William H. Eckert, John A. Smith.

At the meeting of November 13th the following ticket was reported by the nominating committee: President, William L. Strong; vice-presidents, Henry L. Burnett, J. Q. A. Ward, S. S. Packard, Milton I. Southard, Andrew J. C. Foyé; secretary, Evarts L. Prentiss; recording secretary, Marion M. Miller; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees for three years, David H. Bates, George Follett, S. R. Beckwith.

The evening had been designated as "Ladies' Night," and a number of the fairer sex were present. Judge Higley was called to the chair to act as master of ceremonies for the literary and musical entertainment. This consisted of songs by Miss Louise Segur and recitations by Miss Gertrude Chase, "The Little Western Man" and "Back to Old Ohio," and Mr. M. M. Miller in "Heracles and Hylus." Following this Mr. Miller gave a talk upon the pictures exhibited upon the walls of the Society. These were:

Oils: (Sacred subjects), by Spanish masters.

Oils, by Mr. Bruer, of Cincinnati.

Water colors, by Maud Stumm, of Cleveland.

Water colors, by John W. McKechnie, of Cincinnati.

Black and whites, by Maud Stumm.

After a vote of thanks to the singer and speakers, the meeting was adjourned and refreshments served.

The annual meeting of the Society was held on the evening of November 29th. The report of the governing committee contained the following interesting statements: "Possibly the most memorable meeting ever held by the Society was that of February 13, 1893, on which occasion our president, Colonel Strong, presented to the Society Beard's celebrated painting of General Sherman. Some of the notable facts of this presentation were that this picture was the last work of that famous artist; also that this sitting was the last that the 'grand old general,' who was, and whose memory is, so dear to us all, ever gave to any one; and also that it was presented to us by one for whom we all have such a close affection; and, lastly, that the painter, the subject and the donor were all Ohio men and members of this Society.

"In this connection your committee would suggest and recommend that a relief, or charity, fund be established by setting aside a certain percentage of our income, say ten per cent., to be used discreetly under proper limitations, to aid and relieve worthy unfortunates of our household; for even Ohioans sometimes get stranded and occasionally wrecked. This would probably involve a change or amendment to our by-laws."

Treasurer Crall reported that all debts had been paid, and that there remained in the treasury a balance of $2,945.30. The Society then proceeded to the election of officers, and confirmed the choice of the nominating committee.

Gen. Thomas Ewing, first president of the Society, was called on for remarks, and spoke of the foundation of an historical library for Ohio records, etc., as one of the original purposes of the Society. Milton I. Southard paid especial tribute to Colonel Moulton's memory for his services at the inception of the Society. The newly elected officers were called upon, and several made brief speeches.

The meeting of December 11th was held at Morelli's. Col. William L. Strong presided at the dinner table. Mr. Foyé was introduced as "the orator of the Society and a newly elected vice-president." Though the schoolmaster, Mr. Packard, was abroad, Mr. Foyé showed himself perfectly at home in a theme wherein no man could give him coaching. He struck the keynote of loyalty to the Buckeye state in his story of "Hello for Ohio." Mr. Caldwell was called upon and told of "The Ohio Man at the World's Fair." Homer Lee aptly illustrated the pride Ohio takes in her departed sons by the Ohio statue at the World's Fair.

It was announced by the president that the committee on the annual banquet would be appointed in the course of a week, and at a later date the following gentlemen were named: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; Thomas Ewing, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Homer Lee, Wager Swayne, Charles B. Peet, L. C. Hopkins, S. S. Packard, Warren Higley, C. G. Harraman, W. S. Hawk, Leander H. Crall, treasurer; M. M. Miller, secretary.

The governing committee met on January 8, 1894. Homer Lee presented a design for the president's badge, to be composed of a scarf and jewel, the former being of a ribbon of gray and brown, the colors of the buckeye, and the latter suspended from the scarf of gold, circular in form, embodying the grand seal of the state of Ohio, the lettering surrounding the coat of arms to be, "Ohio Society of New York—President—Organized 1885." At the top to appear a buckeye, surrounded by partly opened leaves, and made of a piece of oak from the first house built at Marietta. Above this appears the rising sun. The design was approved and the decoration ordered to be made.

THE first meeting of the Society in 1894 was held pursuant to the following notice: "The next regular meeting will be held at the rooms of the Society, 236 Fifth avenue, on Monday evening, January 8, 1894. As the official announcement of committees will be in order, each member will take notice that he has been appointed a committee of one to relate a personal adventure in which the 'Ohio man' did not distinguish himself. As the date is the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans (Jackson Day), the 'War Horses' are especially requested to come prepared."

At that gathering the standing committees, appointed by the president, and the house committee, appointed by the governing committee, were announced as follows: Literature and art, Warren Higley, chairman; Daniel C. Beard, Franklin Tuttle, Alexander Doyle, J. Q. A. Ward; entertainment, Warren Higley, chairman; Curtis G. Harraman, Andrew J. C. Foyé, W. H. Caldwell, M. M. Miller; library, Thomas Ewing, chairman; Wager Swayne, Henry L. Burnett; auditing, Mahlon Chance, chairman; Frank C. Loveland, William M. Hoffer, Theodore S. Nye, De Frees Critten; membership, S. S. Packard, chairman; Mahlon Chance, Henry A. Glassford, D. C. Beard, William M. Hoffer, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Horace H. Brockway, William H. Caldwell, H. H. Sisson, Theodore S. Nye, Frederick C. Train, Andrew J. C. Foyé, John W. Monahan, Edw. S. Wallace, Frank L. Fisher, Daniel Pritchard; house, Andrew J. C. Foyé, chairman; George Follett, Charles B. Peet.

Speeches by a number of the members followed on various themes; but the record does not show in what manner the Ohioans made confessions in accordance with the call.

At the meeting of the governing committee on February 10th it was ordered that the banquet committee be authorized to publish a book containing a full report of the speeches and proceedings of the annual banquet, and that the treasurer be authorized to pay for the same if the cost did not exceed $150. At the meeting of the Society on February 13th General Swayne made the occasion memorable by his speech of presentation of the president's badge to Colonel Strong. Responses of Colonel Strong and General Burnett followed.

February 17, 1894, was the date of the ninth annual banquet of the

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Ohio Society of New York, and Delmonico's was once more the chosen place. It was in charge of the special committee already named, while the following gentlemen served as a reception committee: Gen. Anson G. McCook, Albert W. Green, D. Robison, Jr., Edgar A. Follett, P. B. Armstrong, Lowell M. Palmer, John F. Rodarmor, H. J. Reinmund, Mahlon Chance, R. C. Kimball, Thomas Ewing, Jr., D. H. Bates, Jr., H. H. Hobbs, S. C. Lewis, J. Stedman Converse. The menu card was almost a duplicate of that of 1893. There was a special guest table, and six others occupied by the members and their friends. Those who sat at the head and foot of each of these were as follows: A, Andrew J. C. Foyé and Charles B. Peet; B, Milton I. Southard and Leander H. Crall; C, Henry L. Burnett and William S. Hawk; D, S. S. Packard and Homer Lee; E, J. Q. A. Ward and Samuel Thomas; F, Warren Higley and L. C. Hopkins.

Hon. William McKinley, governor of Ohio, was the guest of honor, and when he was escorted into the dining hall he was greeted with cheers. Hon. William L. Strong, president of the Society, presided, and those who sat with him at the guests' table were as follows: On his right, Hon. William McKinley, Hon. Charles F. Manderson, Hon. Calvin S. Brice, Bishop John M. Walden, Gen. Horace Porter, George A. Morrison, president St. Andrew's Society; John D. Crimmins, president Friendly Sons of St. Patrick; Charles A. Deshon, president Southern Society; Gen. Thomas Ewing, ex-president Ohio Society. On his left were Hon. William B. Allison, Hon. Joseph H. Outhwaite, Hon. Frank Hurd, Prof. Sylvester F. Scovel, Ellis H. Roberts, president St. David's Society; H. B. B. Staples, president Delaware Society; John P. Townsend, president New England Society; Gen. Wager Swayne, ex-president Ohio Society.

When the dinner, abundantly provided, had been disposed of, President Strong arose and announced that the intellectual feast of the evening had arrived.* He said: "Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York: I take it that the dinner of the Ohio Society at Delmonico's this evening has been enjoyed by all of you, because I see no one before me but that looks as though he had eaten, and, if he did drink at all, drank all that he felt he ought.

"Now, gentlemen, for the benefit of the members of our Society who honor us with their presence only once a year—at our annual banquets—I want to say that the Ohio Society is sound financially, entirely out of debt. Owing to the watchful care of our noble treasurer, he does not allow the governing committee to create an indebtedness for the Society unless he has the money to pay for it; and, as he is one of that committee, the Society is

* Fortunately for this record, the speeches delivered on that memorable occasion, when Governor McKinley was the guest of honor, were stenographically reported and published by order of the Society in pamphlet form. They are here reproduced in full.

never in debt. In addition to that, he has a very handsome balance to its credit in the bank, which is drawing a very fair rate of interest considering the present crucial condition of the money market.

“The grim monster, death, has dealt very lightly with our Society since our last banquet. We have lost but four members out of a membership of about three hundred. The addition to the membership roll has been about as large as in any of the years preceding since the formation of this Society, so that now the Ohio Society of New York is on a firm foundation and is an assured success.

“I am asked very often, What is the reason you Buckeyes kick up such a row in New York once a year? Well, there are a great many reasons for that. First, Ohio was the first state that was admitted into the Union out of the broad expanse of territory ceded to the United States Government by Virginia, and in that celebrated ordinance of 1787 slavery and involuntary servitude, except for crime, was forever prohibited.

“Now, the people, the pioneers of Ohio, that first settled that ‘bonnie Buckeye state,’ were an entirely different class of people from any that settled the states farther west. Their devotion to their cause, their reverence for their God, and their adherence to a form of government by the people which they fought for through the Revolutionary war, attracted the brainiest and the best class of Revolutionary soldiers and their friends that went from the Eastern states to the West. They and their descendants have left their impress on almost every page of history connected with the government of the United States, from its foundation to the present moment.

“Another reason why we celebrate this day is that it is the ninety-first anniversary of the admission of our state into the union; and as Buckeyes we like to feel that we are again spreading flowers over the graves of the heroes who have gone before us from Ohio, and we like to hear from such distinguished gentlemen as have this evening honored us with their presence how the gallant old Ship of State is rolling along at home. There is no Buckeye whose pulse does not quicken at the names of our distinguished men; particularly such men as Allen and Thurman, Ewing and Corwin, Pugh and Pendleton, Chase and Sherman, Hayes, Garfield and Harrison. Also the last Democratic governor of our state, and the present governor, Campbell and McKinley. And that trio of military heroes, whose names will continue forever, and glow with increasing splendor as time rolls on: Grant, Sherman and Sheridan.

“Now, gentlemen, there is another reason why we celebrate to-night—although we have dated ahead a little—the 19th of February being our day, instead of the 17th. Dating ahead is, as you know, quite ordinary in business nowadays. By the providence of God, the state of Ohio was admitted into the Union on the 29th day of November, 1802, but it remained to give us a classic month to celebrate this anniversary in, and when Mr. Jefferson ordered his secretary of state to affix the seal of the government to a document which bound us to this Union forevermore, that document was dated on the 19th of February, 1803; and, gentlemen, when we celebrate the birthday of the Father of our Country, the immortal Washington, in this month; and when we celebrate the birthday of the savior of our country, more commonly called the Messiah of Freedom, Abraham Lincoln, in this month, it is fitting that the state of Ohio should celebrate its birthday on the 19th of February; and so we can only say: 'Roll on, O Ship of State, and let her sons continue to add brighter jewels to her crown than any that have been put there before, even in the pages of art, science, literature, commerce, finance, judiciary, or in the councils of the nation, forever.' And now, gentlemen of the Ohio Society, I would like you to rise and drink the first toast of the evening, 'The President of the United States.'" [Toast drank.]

[Music—"The Star Spangled Banner."]

"Gentlemen, the next order for the evening will be the reading of a poem by Judge Higley, of Cincinnati, now of New York, called 'The Buckeye Tree.'"

Judge Higley: "Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, I beg to correct the President in regard to announcing this poem as having been written by Judge Higley. The poem is by the first poet of Ohio, Dr. W. H. Venable, whom you all know. It is upon the subject of the buckeye tree, in which we are all interested from the fact that we have all received at least two of the products of that tree to-night.

THE BUCKEYE TREE.

BY W. H. VENABLE, LL.D.

When bluebirds glance the sunlit wing,
And pipe the praise of dancing Spring,
Like some gay sylvan prince, and bold,
The buckeye dons his plumes of gold.

When truants angle in the sun,
Or roam the wood with dog and gun,
How tuneful sounds the honeyed tree,
Hummed round by the melodious bee!

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

When boisterous Autumn dashes down
Imperial Summer's rustling crown,
Beneath the scattered spoils we find
The polished nut in bronzen rind.

The buckeye broom, in times of yore,
Swept for the dance the puncheon floor;
The backwoods beaux, hilarious souls,
Quaffed sangaree from buckeye bowls.

The friendly buckeye leaves expand,
Five-fingered, like an open hand,
Of trust and brotherhood the sign—
Be welcome! what is mine is thine.

Historic now, and consecrate.
The emblem of a loyal State,
A symbol and a sign, behold
Its banners green, its plumes of gold.

Ohio's sons! their bugles sang,
Their sabres flashed, their muskets rang,
Forever unto freedom true,
The buckeye boys in Union blue!

[Applause, and cries of "Good!"]

President Strong: "The next regular toast of the evening, gentlemen, will be responded to by one who needs no introduction to this Society nor to any other gathering. He dedicated this Society and christened it; he was at our first banquet and made us a speech then, and some of us were foolish enough to think that he would be a candidate for the Presidency as long ago as that. I doubt if he needs any introduction at any banquet that could be given anywhere on the face of the globe, because there is no foreign country that sends its wares to this country but knows all about McKinley. When in Chicago last summer, attending the exposition there, I happened to be in the Russian department, and a representative of the Czar heard that this man McKinley was going to be at Chicago. He said: 'I will stay here until next year to see that man. He has the largest income of any man in the world, four or five times as much as the Czar of Russia. I want to see him. Any man that collects three or four hundred millions of dollars per annum I want to see. I take off my hat to him.' [Great laughter.] And now, gentlemen, the regular toast of the evening is 'Ohio,' and I have the pleasure of presenting Governor McKinley, of that state." [Prolonged applause.]

When Governor McKinley arose he was greeted with applause and cheers, and his speech was listened to with the closest attention. He said:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York: I have received the impression through some of the prominent members of this Society that there is no limitation in expressions of boastful pride, in this presence, of Ohio men and Ohio character. Indeed, I understand that eulogy is the chief object of this organization. I understand, too, that those of us actually living in Ohio who attend these meetings, are expected to spare no tribute of praise to the Ohio men resident in the city of New York. If this is not done, we are never invited to return. I want to come back, and therefore am prepared to meet any condition or requirement of the Society in this respect, that I may have welcome to your club and board hereafter.

"I am proud of the Ohio men in New York. They represent every profession. They stand in every mart of trade. They are great lawyers, great doctors, great preachers, great teachers, great editors, great bankers, great merchants, great manufacturers, great Democrats, great Republicans, great statesmen, and some of them have been great soldiers. Some of them are on Wall Street, or were, and still others are members, as I am informed, of the Tammany Society, and yet others have got into the sacred circle of the Four Hundred. As I look over this distinguished company I wonder what Ohio would have been if you had all remained at home. In such an event she must certainly have been 'paramount.' But then, I reflect, what would New York have been if you had not come? The stupendous loss to the great Empire State, I am sure, you feel more than I do, and know better than I can describe.

"There are ex-Representatives in Congress from Ohio in this great metropolis; there are no ex-Senators yet. There are ex-Governors, distinguished at home and no less distinguished here. It seems to be a favorite place for ex-Governors, and the way they get on will encourage others to come after them. I might have been a member of this Society myself, if my honored competitor had been kept at home two years ago; and when the exit comes to me, as it comes to all of us, sooner or later, I may be so fortunate as to be received by you yet. I know of no better city in which to dwell than New York, and no better colony of which to be a part than this, outside the sacred precincts of Ohio. The only disparagement to you is that there are not so many of you here as there are in 'Greater Ohio' back at home. You are just as good, just as true, and just as patriotic men that are here, but you are not so numerous as those remaining in Ohio. You have converted the ancient sage advice, 'Go West, young man,' into 'Hustle Down East,' and you have come and amply demonstrated that the Ohio man can succeed quite as well in the older as in the newer states. I only speak the voice of the state when I say: 'Bless you, my children, we are all proud of you.' We will always feel that we have only temporarily loaned you to this great State and great city, and that you will all come home again to do us higher honor and credit than ever. Much as has been done by and for Ohio; still, as the President said of the nation at the Centennial in Philadelphia, she is great enough to appreciate how much there remains for her to attempt and achieve in the future.

"A distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said a few years ago that he could not help applying to Ohio Pericles' proud boast of Athens: 'Athens, of all her contemporaries, is superior to the report of her.' Whatever honors Ohio enjoys here, or elsewhere, I think she has fairly earned them. Her distinction rests upon what she has attempted and achieved in the domain of intellectual activity, and because she has fulfilled every requirement of duty to state and nation, doing always her full share to support the government at Washington in every crisis. The state was early dedicated to liberty. No slave was ever born on her free soil, nor serf tolerated within her boundaries. She has presented the largest opportunity to individual development. She puts no weights upon her citizenship, no manacles upon either soul or body.

"The people who founded the state of Ohio were master builders. If Rufus Putnam was the 'father of Ohio,' George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson were his teachers through the long and severe schooling of the Revolution, from 1775 to 1783. The structure they erected was greatly to their credit, however much Nature may have done to assist the pioneers in the labor of love they had undertaken. We are all of us proud of our state, proud of her place of honor in the sisterhood of states, proud of her fields and factories, proud of her wealth of resources, proud of her benevolent, charitable, and educational institutions, and, above all, proud of our grand old pioneers—their pluck, perseverance, and virtue; their moral and intellectual worth; and, whatever else is said, I always feel like paying my respects and homage to them.

"It was my privilege a short while ago to have described to me a striking but rude and unfinished picture, drawn in pen and ink many years ago. It was the scene at Marietta, the oldest settlement in the state, when the first laws were posted on the great beech trees of the forest, under the personal supervision of Governor Arthur St. Clair, in the summer of 1788. Whatever of art was lacking in this picture, the faces were those of strong, earnest men, well fitted to build a commonwealth. There, in the impenetrable forest, they were demonstrating that profound respect for law and order and constituted authority, to which they ever held, and which they transmitted to their descendants, and which those descendants have themselves well illustrated in every crisis of state and country.

“That they considered this first proclaiming and publishing of the law an important event, was strikingly apparent, not only by the attentive attitude of the little group of revolutionary heroes that were there as our first state officers, who stood watching the posting of the parchment, but by the effect portrayed on the wondering faces of the Indian chieftains who were present. Even the untutored savage saw that this was an event of unusual significance. The beneficent sway of civilization was not to be gained merely by clearing the forests, by the building of forts and stockades, or even comfortable homes. The possession of food and shelter, of splendid farms and generous crops, and all the rich returns of good husbandry were as nothing to these brave pioneers, if their civil and social institutions were not to be preserved, and the law not to be supreme over all. They would first establish courts, schools, and churches, before they thought of the sordid considerations which so often actuated pioneer civilization; and the subsequent career of the state itself is the best proof of their wisdom and foresight.

“Ohio was the centre of population for more than two decades, during which was witnessed the most triumphant period of our own and the world’s annals. Those were decades of mighty struggles, and still mightier achievements. They record events the most striking and far-reaching in our history. They record the mighty social and political transformation which changed the face of the civilized world. We passed during this epoch from a warring federation of weak and weakening states to a mighty and indissoluble Union of indestructible states. We emerged from a civilization half slave and half free to one where all are free; we passed from unequal to impartial citizenship, and from division and weakness to unity and power. In our political autonomy we were unrivalled in simplicity and strength. During these decades we were not only the centre of population, but our citizens occupied the centre of political activity, and contributed masterful forces in the field of war and statecraft. They were leaders in each, and supreme in both. No great battle was fought from 1861 to 1865 with which Ohio’s name was not linked—no great victory achieved in which Ohio, or some son of Ohio, did not share the glory. This period not only witnessed the political and social progress which I have described, but registered the greatest industrial and material development, the widest utilization of our productive forces, and the most wonderful progress in art, science and invention that the world has ever known.

“It is the fashion for us to boast about Ohio. It may not always be timely, and sometimes the praise may be too generous; but no unprejudiced student of our history can hold that it is altogether unjustifiable. The story of the early settlers is the story of heroism and sacrifice, of devotion to freedom and conscience; and their sons have worthily stood, and will forever faithfully stand, for the principles of their sires. The story of Tiffin, Worthington, and Morrow, of Wade, Giddings, and Ewing, of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, of Chase, Stanton, and Brough, and of Hayes, Garfield, and Waite has been often told, but I do not think too often. It cannot be told without being helpful to all. No history of the state can be written which would leave these names out, and no recital of their virtues and achievements can be made which does not inspire our admiration and create within us higher and better and nobler aims. But our state has had no lack of material prosperity. Geographically, no state has a more advantageous position. Ohio is the highway between the East and the West; she is the gateway to the South. This advantage has been so much boasted by our people that General Grant once said, in a spirit of playfulness, as well as rebuke, that I have always appreciated: 'Yes, Ohio is a great state. You can't get to Chicago from New York and back again, on American soil, without crossing it.'

"Ohio is also preëminently a state of workshops. In material resources and their development, in the variety and extent of her applications of human skill, in her production of nearly everything necessary for human existence and happiness, Ohio can be said, without exaggeration, to be 'an empire within an empire.' In cereals, vegetables, and fruits, she stands at the front for variety and excellence; and, to the amazement of her sister states, she took most of the prizes at the World's Fair for her exhibits of cattle, sheep, and swine. In the number and variety of her manufactures also, Ohio leads all the states. She mines not only enough coal for her thousands of furnaces, but annually exports millions of tons. Owing to her vast commerce on the Lakes, more iron ore is handled in Ohio than in any other state. Her rank in manufacturing is equally creditable. Ohio has more manufacturing towns than any other state. Great states may proudly boast of their cities of New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis. It is true Ohio has no cities to rival these, but Ohio can truthfully claim more prosperous manufacturing centres of from ten thousand to one hundred thousand population than any other member of the Union.

"In educational matters Ohio takes a proud position, as her trophies at both the Centennial Exposition and World's Fair have proven. Her graded public schools are not excelled. She expends in a single year for public instruction more than any other of the states of the Union, except New York and Illinois. More than one-tenth of all the money expended in the United States for school purposes is expended by Ohio; and she has a larger percentage of attendance upon instruction, according to population, than any other state of the Union. She is a state of colleges, having between thirty and forty good and flourishing institutions, all firmly established and well supported. She has no Harvard, Yale or Princeton, but her standard of general education, even in the liberal branches, is nearly at the top. Nor is Ohio satisfied to stand still in educational matters. She is always on the march. Her common schools are better to-day than ever before, and some time Ohio will have a state university at her capital far grander and stronger than Washington dreamed might eventually be established by the nation at large at its capital.

“Her judiciary has been able, pure, and learned. Its decisions have commanded confidence in every state and territory of the Union. Hon. Richard A. Harrison, of Columbus, himself a distinguished lawyer, said not long ago, on a banquet occasion: ‘Is there any state in the Union that ever had a bar of greater men, either as lawyers or statesmen, than the bar of which Judge Thurman was one of the most conspicuous members?’ Their names best answer his inquiry. The Ohio bar in Judge Thurman’s time was graced by Hammond, Burnett, Chase, Waite, Ewing, Corwin, Boynton, Swan, Ranney, Stanton, Swayne, Stanley Matthews, Aaron F. Perry, Groesbeck, Day, Hoadly, Storer, and many others of exceptional strength and ability. There have been five men from Ohio upon the Supreme Bench of the United States, two of them reaching the station of chief justice of the greatest tribunal of the world, while death claimed a third before he could assume that exalted station.

“In medicine, science, art, music, poetry, and letters, Ohio has won a leading place. In journalism she has been conspicuous. The Bulgarian Liberator, as he is called, whose fame as a correspondent is international, whose life was a chivalrous romance, whose pen was weighted with power and might, the heroic MacGahan, was a Buckeye boy. His body, transferred from the ancient seat of Eastern empire now rests among the rugged hills of his native county of Perry, where he spent his boyhood, and where was spent the boyhood of the greatest cavalryman of the Civil War—the dashing and intrepid Sheridan. Kennan, also, the daring traveler, whose articles and lectures on Russian cruelty in Siberia have startled two continents, is a product of Northern Ohio. And Edison, the wizard of Menlo, most practical of scientists and greatest of electricians, first saw the light in an Ohio country village. The proud old state may well risk her fame in that field upon the work of this illustrious son, but to Edison she can add Brush, and to Brush the great Dr. Mendenhall, foremost of professors in electrical science.

“No other state in the Union has made a more indelible impression upon the Senate of the United States than has our beloved commonwealth. Worthington and Morrow, Tappan and Allen, Ewing and Morris, Corwin and Chase, Pugh and Wade, Sherman and Thurman, Matthews and Pendleton—

what state can boast stronger men? Wade, rugged and resistless in his convictions, with his colleague Giddings in the House, stood on the very outpost of liberty, fearless and defiant. They were the pioneers of freedom; and the liberty which we enjoy to-day, and which is so universal in our country, and which represents more than any other civilization the best hopes and aspirations of mankind, will be forever associated with their great names. During the Civil War, Wade was at the head of the committee on the conduct of the war, in the Senate. Sherman was a member of the committee upon which rested the duty of raising the vast sums required for the prosecution of the war. At the other end of the capitol were Schenck and Garfield, Shel-labarger, Ashley, Delano, and Bingham. Schenck was chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war, and was a moving force on the committee on ways and means. Garfield was at the head of the committee on military affairs; Bingham, chairman of the judiciary committee; and Ashley, at the head of the committee on territories, under whose administration West Virginia, Nevada, and Nebraska were admitted to the sisterhood of states—jointly controlling the important legislation of that most eventful period. Stanton in the War Office stood like a sturdy oak, unswayed and unbending. Upon him Lincoln rested, and his strong nature impressed itself upon the Union. He moved with but one purpose, actuated by the single motive of patriotism. That purpose he expressed in 1862, when he said: ‘For myself, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, serving no man, and at enmity with none, I shall strive to perform my whole duty in the great work before me. Mistakes and faults I will no doubt commit, but the purpose of my action shall be single to the public good.’ [Applause.]

“Chase was in the treasury department, devising and planning for the public credit and for the enormous revenue required daily to keep in motion the operations of the army; and for a time still another Ohio man, Governor Dennison, was in the Cabinet of the martyr President. It should not be forgotten, also, that when Mr. Chase resigned from the treasury, the first man in the country to whom President Lincoln turned as his successor was ex-Governor Tod, of Ohio, who declined the proffered portfolio.

“Ohio contributed somewhat, at least, to bring to Mr. Lincoln the opportunity which has made his name immortal. In 1860 the Republican National Convention was held in the city of Chicago. The third ballot had been reached; 465 votes had been cast; 233 votes were necessary to a choice. Lincoln had 231 1-2, Seward 180, and the remainder were for Chase and others. Lincoln lacked one vote and a half to give him the requisite number to make him the candidate of the party—the second candidate for President the Republican party had ever named. Supreme silence followed the conclusion of this ballot; every voice was hushed, but for an instant only. During this instant my former fellow-townsmen, David K. Carter (well known to many around this table), a delegate from Ohio, mounted his chair and transferred four votes from Salmon P. Chase to Abraham Lincoln; and amid the huzzas of that crowded, historic wigwam, Lincoln was made the nominee of the Republican party. Some other state might have done it, some other state doubtless would have done it, but the fact remains that Ohio did it. [Laughter and applause.]

“As Ohio’s name is linked with that of Lincoln in the struggles and sacrifices for the Union, so also is it known in the pathos of the death of the great liberator. At his bedside stood his faithful secretary of war; and when, in the gray dawn of that awful morning, the spirit of the immortal Lincoln ascended, the solemn silence was broken by Stanton, who reverently said: ‘Now he belongs to the ages.’

“Standing in this presence to-night, I recall my former visit here. It was the first and only time, until now, that I have had the pleasure of being with you. I remember the distinguished company then assembled. That illustrious son of Ohio, William Tecumseh Sherman, a zealous member of this Society, was present. All interest centred upon him, whatever eminent men surrounded him. All eyes were turned to him, and all hearts were his. I remember, in substance, the opening of his little speech: ‘The world takes count of what men do,’ said he, ‘not what they say; not where they live, but how they live.’ This single sentence was a sermon in itself, and well illustrates the career of him who spoke it. His fame rests in deeds; and while he loved the state of his home and his birth, he loved still more, as all of us do, the nation which he helped to save.

“This sentiment, too, was in keeping with that grand letter of the old hero to a Southern paper, as to the proper obligations of an American citizen respectively due his state and the nation. You will recollect that General Sherman then said: ‘Mathematically, the whole is greater than a part, and is worthy of more respect and affection. Instead of boasting of the spot where one is born, by an accident over which he has no control, I should suppose the boast would be of the former; that is, that every American should be proud of his whole country, rather than a part. How much more sublime the thought that you live at the root of a tree whose branches reach the beautiful fields of Western New York and the majestic cañons of the Yellowstone, and that with every draught of water you take the outflow of the pure lakes of Minnesota, and the drippings of the dews of the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains!’” [Prolonged applause.]

President Strong: “Fellow Buckeyes, it is not often that we have the pleasure of being graced at our banquets by the ladies; and I would like every member of the Ohio Society to get on his feet and drink to the health and future happiness of the wife of the Governor of Ohio. [Cheers.]

“When I was a boy in my father’s house, we kept what the boys called a ministerial hotel. All the services we had in those days were in the school houses. We had no churches in the little town in which I was born. We had just one place in which to go to school and one place in which to have services on Sunday, and they were held by the Methodists, the Baptists, and the Presbyterians. Those three predominated in our part of the world, and the ministers would always come to our house. The most popular minister that came there was the presiding elder of the Methodist Church. When he rode into our barn on his horse—he always had the best horse in the country, and was generally considered the best horse trader—we knew there would be fun for us children, for the reason that we always had school on Saturday and Monday, but when the Methodists had their quarterly meetings, and the presiding elder came around, Saturday and Monday were holidays. Another reason why we always liked to have the presiding elder come was that he always said the shortest blessing, made the shortest prayer, and always told us the best stories. I give you, gentlemen, ‘The Pioneer Preacher, the Circuit-rider of Ohio,’ and have the pleasure of introducing to you Bishop Walden, of Cincinnati.” [Applause.]

Bishop Walden: “I have been studying your chairman since I had the pleasure of sitting by his side, as an instance of the influence of Ohio upon the boy; but I have just now learned one of the real secrets of why we have this capital presiding officer—it was the influence of the circuit rider.

“Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York, lovers of Ohio: To share with you in your annual meeting is to me an esteemed privilege; to be selected as one of the necessarily limited number of speakers is a high honor; to be invited to respond to the sentiment, ‘The Circuit-rider in Ohio’ is a recognition of Methodism and my relation to it, at once complimentary to my church and gratifying to myself. Under these circumstances I will be expected to speak mainly of the favorable influence of Methodism in our native state as it appears to a Methodist and a Buckeye. So much is crowded into the century since the first circuit-rider entered the Ohio territory that it is no easy task to select a few salient facts that may fittingly engage your attention amid the inspiring eloquence of my distinguished compeers who as citizens of Ohio promote her welfare, or who, residing in this city or elsewhere, reflect honor upon their native state.”

Bishop Walden proceeded to give a masterly history of the times covered by his theme, and in conclusion said:

“Take from the history of the war between the nation and the seceding states the chapters that record the part borne by Ohio, and what remains would be fragmentary if not unintelligible. Three names alone would give our state an incontestable position—Sheridan, Sherman, Grant; and may I mention that the last was reared in a Methodist home and was familiar with the work and spirit of the circuit-riders. And while this great trio was in the field, the other Sherman and his coadjutors were foremost in Congress. Review the century, and the galaxy of Ohio statesmen seem to fill the very sky; five of them called to the highest civil trust, and that after an honorable service in their country's defense—the elder Harrison, the hero of Tippecanoe; Grant, great whether at the head of the army or at the head of the government; Hayes, who illustrated his own wise axiom, 'He serves his party best who serves his country best'; Garfield, the self-made man and chivalrous leader; the younger Harrison, whose incorruptible administration is the nation's pride.

"As the country now trembles and reels under the unprecedented financial stress, the eyes of the people are again turning toward Ohio for leaders whose ability has been tested; and Ohio, proud mother, points each great party confidently to a very constellation made up of ex-governors, governor, and senators, and the ex-President and other Buckeyes in other states, and bids each select its standard-bearer from among her favorite sons. My theme makes it fitting to refer to the Methodist affiliations of the magnetic Foraker and others, but I only venture the conjecture that your honored guest, Governor McKinley, might have been a popular circuit-rider and become a bishop had it not been possible for him to serve his country as well or better as a statesman and—President." [Applause.]

President Strong: "Gentlemen, I am going to present to you a man whose father was governor of the old Keystone State. He was elected by the people, for that is the way they elected in Pennsylvania. I do not know that he ever did any special thing with the exception of getting a boy; and as the Pullman palace cars have more porters in their establishment born in the state of Ohio than in any other state of the Union I will introduce to you General Horace Porter." [Applause.]

General Porter: "Mr. President and Gentlemen: This is not fair. Your presiding officer promised me this afternoon that if I would come here and sit, even up on the roof, he would not only not call upon me to speak, but he would not permit me to speak if I wanted to. I have not anything to catch on to. I thought I had something during the feast—they served a buckeye, and I was ignorant enough to mistake it for a chestnut. I suggested that they might serve that better later in the dinner, and we could make more effectual use of it. I suppose I shall have to resort to the natural method as advised by that man in Ohio whose son was elected a member of Congress. In parting with him he said: 'Now, Jack, when you get into that house you just pump your cerebral barrel full of ideas, and when you get onto your feet knock out the bung and let nature caper.'

"I am still a little puzzled to know just how I got into this Sanhedrim to-night. History would have us believe that at the outbreak of the Revolution there was a battle fought on Breed's Hill. It was called the Battle of Bunker Hill because it was not fought there. I suppose I am here in the society of the sons of Ohio to-night because I was not born there. Perrin of France said, after several ineffectual attempts to be elected a member of the French Academy, that he would write an epitaph to be put on his tomb, and it read: 'Here lies Perrin. He was nothing, not even a member of the French Academy.'

"Now, I have just returned from this great state of Ohio, and I bring you the latest bulletin from the front. I went out to speak at the great Lincoln banquet, and I supposed then as now that I might not be called upon to speak. I went out by invitation of my friend Governor McKinley, and I thought he might at least have thrown around me some of those great principles of protection, but he didn't. He put a duty on me. It was not ad valorem, or I could have sworn it off. It was specific. Well, I met all of the great men from all parts of Ohio at that banquet. The woods are full of them. I met the men from the Ohio and from the Maumee valley; from the place where they feed on hogs to the place where they feed on frogs. I met the men from Cincinnati, where now we understand that they are closing up the windows of the stores during the day and burning lard lamps, for in the general fall in the price of commodities lard light is cheaper than daylight.

"There is one reason that Ohio is never talked much of in foreign countries. A foreigner cannot pronounce that name. I have seen in Europe men try to pronounce Ohio for an hour at a time, and it ended only in salivation or lockjaw. You see in that, you have nothing to catch on to. If you lose your grip you are gone.

"If you want to pronounce that other name, Hi-hi-waii, and you get tangled up, you can fall back and call it Sandwich Islands. If you want to pronounce the name of that dusky savage potentate, of evanescent virtue and volcanic origin, you can call her Lili-cuckoo-alani.

"I had a most comfortable trip through the manufacturing regions of Ohio—no cinders from stacks smutting and soiling my linen, and no smoke blackening my face. Now, when Governor McKinley was in Congress he always made a failure of this sort of thing. He was never a howling success as an abater of the smoke nuisance. Now, I noticed out there that they did not make as much distinction of colors in that state as they do in the state just across the Ohio River. They do not pronounce 'nigger' with two g's. Why, we had a colored bishop at that banquet that made about the best speech there. He was so black that charcoal would have made a white mark on him. He had been a slave. I think he was one of the charcoal sketches from the hands of the old masters. When I listened to that man's speech I felt like saying what an old abolitionist of Boston said when Forrest went up there and blackened up his face and played Othello. This man took a party down from the country. He listened till they were all through, then he said to the friends who were with him: 'Well, now, as to the merits of them actors, laying aside all sectional prejudices, darn me, if I don't think the nigger held his own with the hull on 'em.'

"The redoubtable Jim Fisk once said: 'If you can't be a rich man, just get as close up to a rich man as you can.' Not being able to be born in Ohio, I did the next best thing and was born in the state right alongside of it. I hesitated for some time, but since I have heard these speeches here to-night and heard that state cried up in this manner, I see I made a mistake. Henry Ward Beecher once said that the most dangerous thing a man can do is to be born. I think, after listening to these speeches to-night that most any one who was brought up in that benighted region outside of Ohio, would be willing to be born again if he could be sure he would be landed in Ohio.

"There were certain things in common between those two states—the dialect. A man from Pennsylvania goes South; they listen to him talk and they think he is from New England. He goes to New England; they listen to him there, and think he is from the South. He goes out to Ohio, and it is more discouraging still—they think he belongs there. Now, I spent nearly thirty years trying to get away from the reach of Ohio men, and I have not succeeded yet. I started out in the war with Gilmore from Ohio, and went up and joined McClellan's staff. He had gone out with a commission from Ohio—Ohio again. I then planned to go West, and they assigned me to Rosecrans' staff—Ohio again. Then Sherman's staff—Ohio. Then General Grant's staff—Ohio man again. Then I thought the only way for me to get out of reach of these people was to leave the army and go into the navy. I made an expedition down the coast in a gunboat commanded by Commodore Ammen—an Ohioan. I said then, we will never get this thing fixed until the war ends. It ended, and we went to electing a President—Grant—Ohio again. Second term. I said, we will go out to Cincinnati and fix the thing this time—Hayes. I said, now we will get loose from them at Chicago, and we worked nine days—Garfield. Tried it again—Harrison. I had a case in the Supreme Court. There was Waite—postponed the case. I came over to New York and joined the Loyal Legion—Commander General Swayne, an Ohioan. I thought there was no hope for a man on this continent, and I went abroad. I got to Paris. There was Whitelaw Reid, a minister, from Ohio. Well, now I am getting used to it. I am going right through with it, and I shall take the supreme satisfaction of going to the polls at the next Presidential election and voting for a man from Ohio.

“ Now, with my experience, which you see has not been limited in regard to these two states, I have divided my attention between them. I feel a little like that tramp who went a number of nights into Spurgeon’s Tabernacle, South London. Mr. Spurgeon went down and took a look at him—a closer view—one evening. His dress did not even rise to the dignity of the shabby genteel. It was evident from his garments that he did not belong to the London Four Hundred. Mr. Spurgeon took him by the hand after the service and said: ‘ My friend, I hope that these meetings have done you some good.’ The man replied, in a voice husky with gin: ‘ It has, your honor, it has. When I first came here I was a reckless and a desperate man. I hated both God and the devil. Now, coming here and hearing your sermons I love them both.’ I have mentioned all the distinguished Ohio men that I can think of this evening, thinking they might not be referred to in the speeches that are to be made.

“ Yes, I often in the war used to look at that state of Ohio on the map. We used maps more then than we do now. I could see that comparatively narrow neck of land where the lake swoops down and where the Ohio swoops up. That was a great gateway through which all traffic and people had to pass in moving from the loyal East to the loyal West, and was a great centre and is a great centre to-day of population, of intelligence, equally removed from the isms that existed in the extreme sections of the country about it. That little narrow neck of land which forms the gateway between East and West used to look to me on the map like the waist of some of our young ladies after they had employed a stout maid and had been lacing for several years.

“ Let me say, after participating in this very hospitable feast, that I can only say before I sit down what was said by an Ohio man when we were on the march and got to a river and were ordered to wade across it. It had swamps for miles on each side. The leading regiment—it was an Ohio regiment—Ohio was always in the front—had waded half a day and did not find any t’other side to the stream, and this man turned round to his chum and said: ‘ Bill, I’m blowed if I don’t believe we’ve struck this river lengthwise.’ When I view the length and the breadth and vast extent of Ohio’s hospitality here to-night I feel, for one, that I have struck it lengthwise.” [Great applause.]

President Strong: “ The General has given us a full history of the old Keystone state; but those of us who were born in log cabins in Ohio—and I should think by looking around that there are only half a dozen or so of you—remember well the little log schoolhouse, and just how every man that sent a child, one or two or half a dozen children, to school had to furnish wood enough to burn all winter. He also had to board the teacher just as long as his proportion of time was apportionate to the number of children that he had; and one of the joyous occasions of going to school in a little log school-house always came around on Christmas Day. That was the time when the boys revelled in the anticipation of getting a few decayed apples into the schoolhouse and getting there early in the morning to build the fire, and barring the door—barring the master out; and if we could open the port-holes, which were paper greased over with lard, for windows—if we could open one of those and fire these decayed apples out at our teacher, we were just the boys that the girls all fell in love with. And that was what we all liked to do, to keep our teacher out on Christmas Day, and we were generally successful in doing it until about eleven o'clock, when our parents, both fathers and mothers, would come around, and we had to surrender, but we surrendered with the understanding that no birch rods would be used. A boy then that had an elementary spelling-book, and Kirkham's grammar, and Daboll's arithmetic, was a millionaire; and if he was bright enough to study his lessons in daytime he could farm these books out in the evening for five or ten cents a night for each book, provided he would take it in kites or something of that kind, and the last day of school was generally the day that all of our troubles were settled. Now, gentlemen, we have here this evening a professor, a president of one of the celebrated universities of Ohio—President Scovil, of Wooster, Ohio, who will give us a dissertation on 'The Early Schools Contrasted with the Present School System of the State.' I have the honor of introducing to you now President Scovil, of Wooster, Ohio." [Applause.]

Dr. Scovil delivered an extended and scholarly address upon his theme, and in conclusion said:

"Our past and our present assure us of the best material the sun ever shone upon. And the colleges of Ohio, linking hands with the whole secondary education, are pressing eagerly forward toward the goal of an ideal fundamental education of statesmen. In this we are quickened by whatever is new in the times upon which we are fallen. When the very deepest questions are coming into view, when 'direct legislation' proposes to submit to the popular verdict questions formerly reserved for legislative experts, carrying forward the evolution of ages from aristocratic exclusiveness to democratic diffusiveness, an ample and adapted education is demanded. Much is now being accomplished, opening the way for more. The one per cent. of college men the country affords are not found in business (as Carnegie complains), but they are found where they belong, and where for the good of the country they must continue to go (while the percentage continues so small)—among the directing classes. They are telling powerfully on our legislative and administrative life now, just as they did in the great Constitutional Convention. The scholar is in politics because the people will have him there, and the Ohio colleges are supplying an urgent demand in making political scholars.

“In the whole Ohio college policy there is nothing but that which has come through our great commonwealth’s historical development, nothing which does not already go powerfully toward man-making for private life and public, and therefore everything to set forward and develop with a generous and confident loyalty.” [Applause.]

President Strong: “Gentlemen, according to an old Ohio soldier, he always keeps the best troops in the rear, and we have this evening a gentleman from Washington, who represents the capital of our state in Congress, who has come on here to tell us something about ‘The Ohio Statesman.’ I have the pleasure of introducing to you Mr. Outhwaite, of Columbus, Ohio.” [Applause.]

Mr. Outhwaite said: “Mr. President and Members of the Ohio Society of New York: Before responding to the toast, ‘Ohio’s Statesmen,’ I must express my deep appreciation of the honor conferred by your courteous invitation to attend this ninth anniversary of your organization. Were I a sojourner in this city, or a resident thereof, I should deem it a high privilege to be a member of this Society. Since I was born the population of Ohio, my native state, has increased over two millions. The number of its inhabitants is now greater than that of the thirteen original colonies when they declared their independence; yet in this very city of New York, one hundred and seven years ago, the Ohio Company, then but recently organized in the State of Massachusetts to project a settlement in the Ohio country, after tedious and lengthened negotiations succeeded in contracting with the Continental Congress for a million and a half acres of land for the Ohio Company at two-thirds of a dollar per acre. This company then proceeded to make arrangements for the settlement of their newly acquired possessions in the wilderness. The details are interesting, but I shall not dwell upon them. Two matters to which the company gave special attention, however, are noteworthy in view of the programme of this Society to-night, in that it has been addressed by a venerable divine and an eminent professor. Among the arrangements first made by the Ohio Company was one to employ a suitable person as a public teacher, and another to employ a suitable person as a preacher of the gospel, at the settlement they were about to establish; but the company omitted or wholly neglected to employ a statesman. Perhaps they thought that with piety and learning prospering in their midst, statesmanship would spring up in their community as Minerva sprang fully equipped from the brain of Jove. But more likely they felt intuitively that every man among those sturdy pioneers was himself a statesman. The forty-eight persons who disembarked from the ‘Adventure Galley’ at the mouth of the Muskingum, April 7, 1788, had come out into the wilderness to lay the corner-stone of one of the greatest political edifices that has ever sheltered millions of brave, prosperous and happy freemen. They were certainly the progenitors of the state builders of the great Northwest. Within fifty years of their coming, Ohio had a million and a half of people, and had already made such rapid strides in its internal improvement, its systems of navigation, its jurisprudence, and its enlargement of public education, as to become an example to some of the older states. In the promotion of those interests of the people, the wisdom of her statesmen had appeared. While Ohio was thus making a grand and glorious career for herself, some of her more adventurous citizens were pushing on into fresher fields of pioneer work, so that in the history of almost every territory we find evidences of their presence and progress. They helped to form the constitution of every new state carved out of the Northwest Territory, and to start and conduct the government thereof. For three-quarters of a century after the last war with England there was scarcely a Western state that did not have, either as a representative in Congress or as governor or as a United States senator, a son of Ohio, native or adopted. Since I have been in Congress, at one time there were thirty-six senators and representatives from other states who were either natives of Ohio or had lived there in their youth long enough to have their statesmanship permeated with the essence of Buckeye civilization. Among them was one who, in youth, had directed his course eastward and then came to Congress as a representative from the granite hills of New Hampshire; one in the Pennsylvania delegation. Another Ohioan, 'native and to the manner born,' drawn eastward also, was one of the wittiest and most eloquent, one of the ablest and best of the legislators that ever came from this great metropolis into the halls of Congress—Sunset Cox. Other instances could be given of Ohioans who have represented the older States in Congress. Our people have not been content to spread out in one direction only. They have radiated in every direction. That is why there are so many Buckeyes here this evening. We have already penetrated back into Massachusetts, where the Ohio Company originated. Governor McKinley, no doubt, would like to capture Maine early in 1896. There was a New England society which used to meet in Columbus, Ohio, when I was a youth. We never got through learning how much we owed the East. The lesson broke off about twenty-five years ago.

“Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote here from an Ohio paper issued during the past week in my own city: ‘Ohio has had thirty-nine governors, and the list is one that an Ohioan may view with pride. There are in the list proportionally as many names that figure in national history as in the same list of any other state. One of our governors, Rutherford B. Hayes, became President. Three—Thomas Corwin, Salmon P. Chase, and Charles Foster—became secretary of the treasury; while two—Return Jonathan Meigs and William Dennison, Jr.—became postmaster-general. Tiffin, Meigs, Worthing, Brown, Corwin, Chase, and Allen served in the United States Senate; while Huntington, Morrow, McArthur, Vance, Shannon, Corwin, Mordecai Bartley, Medill, Cox, Hayes, Allen, Young, Foster and McKinley served in the lower house of Congress.' The editor has inadvertently omitted the name of one governor who served in the bigger house of Congress, James E. Campbell. We can further distinguish this list to-night by saying that it contains two prospective Presidents. Should they be entered against each other, it will be no scrub race, let me assure you. The last national administration was chiefly born in Ohio; that is to say, the President and four members of his cabinet were. I regret to mention the fact that the present administration falls considerably below the last one, in this respect. If I say this with a sorrowful heart and a sad voice, let no gentleman here suspect that I am thus moved solely by the refrain of personal disappointment. That one elector of ours did not count for much.

"If we could collect the names of the sons of Ohio who have been the statesmen of other states, holding many of their most important state offices, and those who have represented other states in the Congress of the United States, and such as, born or brought up in Ohio, have held high places in the executive branch of our national government, and add these to the illustrious names of all that can be truly styled Ohio statesmen, what a galaxy we should have! Would the stars in our view in the heavens above us to-night furnish halos for them all? The statesmen from Ohio always rise to the level of the grandest occasions. But recently, on Thursday of last week, one of them proposed in the Senate of the United States to amend the calendar of our holy days. He rose with dignity and gravity, made a motion to adjourn, and eloquently alluded to the fact that 'yesterday was Ash Wednesday and to-morrow Good Friday. Certainly the Senate should adjourn over that day.' The grave and reverend senators discussed only the question as to whether there was any precedent for such action, whether the Senate of the United States ever before adjourned over Good Friday. Two boys were discussing the subject of Good Friday, and one of them said to the other: 'What is all this about Good Friday?' The other in his superior wisdom said, sneering at his companion: 'Don't you know about Good Friday? Well, you had better go home and read your Robinson Crusoe, then.'

"To recall in suitable words the various distinguished statesmen of or from Ohio, would occupy the whole of an evening, and it would require more than one grand volume to faithfully portray their noted labors and achievements.

"Mr. Chairman, in the State of Ohio there are no mountains, but many hills and hillocks; yet even from the summit of the smallest of these the Ohio statesman's vision surveys all that lies between him and the distant horizon of the whole country." [Applause.]

President Strong: "The Ohio Society always observes the Sabbath day to keep it holy, but before we adjourn we have two or three telegraphic dispatches that we would like to read. [Dispatches read.] I hope the Ohio Society feels, as its president does, that we are under many obligations for the interesting addresses that have been presented to us this evening by the gentlemen from Ohio and from Washington. I now declare this meeting adjourned."

CHAPTER XI

AT the meeting of March 10, 1894, Governor McKinley was elected an honorary member of the Society. The April meeting, of which no date is given, and no minutes were taken, consisted of stereopticon views of Ohio scenery, and General Swayne gave a running commentary on the views. This was followed by banjo music and negro recitations by the Misses Leach.

May 15th was ladies' night. The president, in opening the meeting, mentioned the honor that Ohio had lately received during the dedication ceremonies of the monument to the mother of Washington, the widow of Chief Justice Waite, of Toledo, having been called to preside on that occasion. Judge Higley, chairman of the entertainment committee, took charge of the evening's entertainment, which consisted of college songs by the University Glee Club, recitations by Mrs. Harriet Webb, and a picture exhibition of the works of Rubens and other artists. This was followed by a collation and social chat. On June 8th Mr. Foyé, chairman of the house committee, on behalf of Franklin Tuttle, presented to the society the portrait of its president, William L. Strong. Dr. Beckwith and the recording secretary were appointed a committee to draft resolutions of acceptance and thanks to Mr. Tuttle for his generous gift to the Society. It was resolved to authorize Mr. Foyé to arrange with Mr. Tuttle for the painting of a portrait of Colonel Moulton, one of the founders of the Society, then deceased.

The last regular monthly meeting before the summer vacation was held at Morelli's, on June 11th. General Swayne, of the library committee, suggested that each member should contribute books especially appropriate for preservation. The features of the evening were two extended and impromptu yet finished addresses by Dr. Beckwith and General Swayne, the doctor's being upon the "Influence of Ohio Mothers," and the general's upon the "Effect of Surroundings and Associations upon Character."

During the summer an invitation was received from the commissioner of the centennial commemoration of the battle of Fort Defiance, at Defiance, Ohio, on August 8th, and the following reply sent:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“New York, July 26, 1894.

“At a meeting of the governing committee of the Ohio Society, held this day, we unanimously “Resolved, That the invitation extended to the Society by the Fort Defiance centennial committee to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the battle of Fort Defiance on the 8th day of August, 1794, was received and placed on file, and while it would be impossible for a committee of gentlemen from the Society to attend the ceremonies on that day, yet they will be with you in spirit, and join with the friends of Ohio and patriotic citizens of the Northwest in preserving the memory of General Anthony Wayne and his gallant associates in their struggle in defence of the Northwest Territory. Regretting that the Society cannot be represented by a body of gentlemen, we remain,

“W. L. STRONG, President.”

At the first fall meeting, held on October 8th, the following gentlemen were elected to serve on the committee for nomination of officers for the coming year: Chas B. Peet, chairman; George B. Hibbard, Henry B. Wilson, E. A. Follett, F. H. Kingsbury, John A. Smith, Franklin Tuttle. The following telegram was read, from S. S. Packard: “Nothing less than the rupture of an ear drum could keep me from you to-night, and so rejoicing with you as a strong man to run a race I say peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces.—S. S. Packard.” November 12th was ladies' night, and there was a large attendance. The nominating committee offered the following ticket: President, Henry L. Burnett; vice-presidents, S. S. Packard, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Milton I. Southard, Geo. E. Armstrong, E. C. Bodman; secretary, Evarts L. Prentiss; recording secretary, Marion M. Miller; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, Lowell M. Palmer, Richard J. Chard, Jerome D. Gillett.

Relative to the honor conferred upon the Society by the election of its president, William L. Strong, to the office of mayor of New York, telegrams and letters of congratulation were read from Governor William McKinley, Senator Sherman and others, and the following resolutions offered by S. S. Packard were unanimously adopted:

“1. The Ohio Society of New York feels specially honored in the selection of its president to be the mayor of New York; and our acknowledgments are due, first to the committee of seventy and the anti-Tammany organizations for recognizing in Colonel Strong the qualities which we have so long known to exist, and, next, to the thoughtful people of this city—men and women—who have so gloriously promoted his election.

“2. We believe that there has been no mistake in this election—that

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Colonel Strong not only possesses the spirit and desire, but the solid qualities as well, that will justify the expectations and reward the hopes of the people.

“3. While we are proud to know him as a friend and associate, and while we appreciate that simplicity of character and modesty of demeanor that make him ‘one of us,’ in the truest sense, we feel that the best service we can render to him and the city is to save him from the annoyance and embarrassment of personal solicitations or unsought advice and to leave his hands unfettered and his mind free to act in all the functions of his great office.

“4. And so we, the members of the Ohio Society, take this occasion to pledge to our honored president and friend our moral support in the great duties that have come to him, and to express our confidence in his ability to discharge those duties, unswerved by personal considerations, and in the highest interests of the people.

“5. We hail with unalloyed satisfaction the determination of the committee of seventy and allied organizations—including Dr. Parkhurst—to remain intact, and not to cease their vigilance until the good work so gloriously begun shall have been so gloriously consummated.”

In further honor of William L. Strong as its retiring president, the following resolution, presented by Henry L. Burnett, was unanimously adopted:

“Our president having been asked ‘to go higher up,’ to be mayor of this great city and the representative of its good people in their war upon the corruption, the vice and crime which have so generally permeated and controlled its public life; now, at the close of his presidency of our Society, we deem it fitting and proper that an opportunity should be given for the members to testify their gratitude to Colonel Strong for his long and faithful services in that office, and their warm attachment and high regard for him as a man, to take him by the hand and say, ‘God help you, and the good God keep and guide you in accomplishing the great work to which you have been called by the people.’ To this end,

“Be It Resolved, That a complimentary dinner be given to Colonel Strong at Delmonico’s at such time as may best suit his convenience.”

In pursuance of the above resolution it was resolved to give the banquet on Tuesday evening, December 4th, at Delmonico’s. The following members were appointed to make arrangements for the same: Banquet committee, S. S. Packard, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, Wager Swayne, Thomas Ewing, Leander H. Crall, treasurer; Homer Lee, A. J. C. Foyé, Charles B. Peet, W. S. Hawk, L. C. Hopkins, Warren Higley, C. G. Harraman, M. M. Miller, secretary.

The special purpose of the meeting being the presentation to the Society of the fine oil portraits of the late Col. Charles W. Moulton, one of the founders of the Society, and of President William L. Strong, mayor-elect, Warren Higley, chairman of the entertainment committee, took the chair. Speeches were delivered by Gen. Thomas Ewing, Chancellor MacCracken, C. C. Shayne, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Col. William P. Fogg, and others. A certificate of Colonel Moulton's membership in the Army of the Tennessee was presented to the Society by Homer Lee. After a few felicitous remarks by Colonel Strong, the meeting was adjourned, and a collation served. During an interval in the social time, the members were entertained with a piano selection by Miss Nellie Knapp, of Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

The annual meeting of 1894 was held on November 30th, with President Strong in the chair. The officers proposed above were unanimously elected. After a few remarks by the retiring president, which were of a light and humorous nature, but direct from the heart, he thanked the Society for the approaching honor, it was to tender him as its retiring president and mayor-elect, in the banquet at Delmonico's. At the conclusion the mayor-elect said: "If I knew that this Society would tender me a banquet after my course as mayor, it would delight me beyond measure, for I prize the good opinions of my old friends in the Ohio Society more than those of any others of my fellow-citizens, as I have prized the honor of my position as president of this Society even above that of my new office."

General Burnett, in assuming the gavel of the president, responded in an equally felicitous manner, engaging himself, to the best of his ability, to emulate his worthy predecessors in the office, General Ewing, General Swayne and Colonel Strong. S. S. Packard and Dr. Beckwith followed with some apt remarks.

Mr. Packard, as chairman of the banquet committee, reported success in securing prominent speakers, and Mr. Crall, the treasurer, reported assurance of the financial success of the dinner. On motion of C. C. Shayne a vote of thanks was tendered President Strong for his services to the Society during the three terms of his office.

The following extracts are from the annual report of the governing committee, made on this occasion:

"Shakespeare says there are three classes of mortals who are great, namely: Those who are born great, those who achieve greatness, and those who have greatness thrust upon them. To the first class about two hundred and fifty of our number belong. With St. Paul, we can say: we are Roman born. To the second class fifty of our number have risen, having served in Ohio at least seven years, which, by the way, is but half the length of time Jacob was required to serve Laban for his Rachel, and, for the great love he bore her, those years seemed to him but as one day. No doubt our immortals of class two esteem their sojourn in Ohio (their adopted home) as of similar brevity,

Henry L. Burnett

President from November 29, 1894, to November 29, 1898

because only thus could they have achieved their present greatness. We have no third class, although during the past year an ineffectual effort was made to establish such an order by making eligible to membership in the Ohio Society those primarily unfortunate beings not born in Ohio, but who become fortunate through having married Ohio maidens. Had that proposal carried, we should doubtless have witnessed an alarming exodus of New York men to the Ohio land of Canaan for the purpose of capturing the Buckeye girls, whose honeymoons would have then included a ladies' night at No. 236 Fifth avenue, provided the governing committee had been able to pass upon so many applications to membership in this third class thus established.

“Regarding our membership, our worthy recording secretary has furnished the following interesting statistics: Average years of residence in Ohio of non-native members, 19; longest residence in Ohio of non-native member, seventy years, namely, ex-Senator Henry B. Payne, born in New York state; shortest resident in Ohio of native member, two years, namely, James M. Johnson, of Denver, Col., born in Bolivar, O. The oldest native Ohio born member is P. D. Hall, formerly of Akron, now of New York city, who is about ninety years of age. The youngest native Ohio born member, so far as can be gleaned from the records, is Paul Worth Smith, of Oxford, Ohio, age about twenty. Our members come from eighty-four places in Ohio, as follows: Sixty from Cincinnati, 41 from Cleveland, 19 from Columbus, 9 from Mansfield, 8 each from Wooster and Youngstown, 7 each from Akron, Marietta, Steubenville and Toledo, 5 each from Springfield and Zanesville, and 1, 2, 3 or 4 each from the other seventy-two places. The governing committee is about to lose one of its number—our retiring president—who is called to higher honors and more important public duties. We lose him with sincere regret. He was our most punctual member, because our regular meetings have been held in his bank at the close of banking hours, and he could not get away. Nearly thirty years have elapsed since Ohio saved our country, for we all agree that she did save it. It has remained for an Ohio man to save our adopted city, the metropolis of our country. We pray that God may help him in his herculean task, and we promise him our united and our individual support in his great undertaking.

“Since the immortal Lincoln's time—thirty years ago—only one president of the United States has been selected who was not an Ohio man, and that one bears the name of one of Ohio's great cities. In all probability, many persons voted for Cleveland because they had an idea that, bearing such a name, he was an Ohio man. It looks now, however, as if the Ohio order of things will be wholly resumed in 1896, when one of our immortals of the first class will take charge of the White House, for, even if McKinley's star shall wane, there are many others shining brilliantly, some of the first magnitude, as, for instance, Harrison, Thurman, Allison, Campbell, Sherman and Strong, saying nothing of Ewing and Swayne, Burnett and Brice, Foraker and West, and, as in Sisera's conflict of old, described in Holy Writ, these bright, particular, Ohio-born stars, in their courses, shall fight against the stars from all other states, and surely one from Ohio's constellation shall eclipse the rest. In any event, the Ohio Society is prepared to furnish a man on tap whenever public office seeks the man and when the man does not seek the office, for it is admitted even by our enemies that Ohio never or seldom takes what she cannot reach."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The report of the secretary was as follows:

"To the president and members of the Ohio Society of New York: Remembering the able and comprehensive report made by his predecessor, the present incumbent of the office of secretary, after performing for one year its honorary but not onerous duties, has reached the conclusion that the chief, if not the only, remaining active function of the secretary's office is that of presenting a report. If the report now offered seems to any one meagre in its statement of facts, the secretary begs that the members of the Society will kindly attribute that deficiency to those circumstances which have led him to the conclusion mentioned.

"Keeping the roll of members is one of the constitutional duties of the secretary. The few changes which have taken place, except by the addition of newly elected members, have made this duty easy and pleasant. I apprehend that this is due in good part to a policy which I believe has been long pursued by our worthy treasurer, and that is: never to drop a member from the list if it can be avoided. And whether a man wishes to resign or not, our esteemed brother is not disposed to consider a member's wishes in this respect, but continues to revive his flagging interest from time to time by gentle monetary communications, accompanied by an extract from the constitution. That extract sets forth the fate of one who becomes delinquent in his dues. Most of the members have probably never observed this extract, for our kind-hearted financier has it printed on the back of his communication, as I am informed, so that it shall not be seen. By such gracious conduct of his office he makes light the secretary's duty in keeping the roll of members, and succeeds as well in making reports with which no other officer can hope to compete.

"Every report, to be a report, should, I suppose, have some figures in it. Here are a few. The Ohio Society now numbers 4 honorary members, 253 resident members, 69 non-resident members; total, 326. We have represented fifty-five counties, Hamilton county furnishing the largest delegation, with sixty-one members, and Cuyahoga county the next, with fifty-one members. There are thirty-three counties in Ohio which are not, but ought to be, represented in this Society.

“I remember a gentleman reading a paper before this Society, some years ago, in which he several times made the suggestive and pointed assertion, ‘We need more members and we need more money.’ That assertion seems to be quite as pertinent now as it was then; for the question still remains, how are we to get more members, and how are we to keep them?”

“I conceive that the two amendments proposed to our constitution at the last meeting of the Society would to some extent answer this question. The amendment by which a reduction would be made in the dues of non-resident members ought to result in diminishing the number of resignations from the roll of such members and in adding to it many new names. There is another amendment providing for a special class of non-resident members, composed of gentlemen of the Ohio press, who shall furnish us with their papers or periodicals, this class of members being excused from dues. Such a measure would, if I am not mistaken, add greatly to the influence and reputation of the Society in Ohio and to its strength and interest here. The expense would practically amount to nothing more than that incurred for the extra number of notices and year books which would be required and the postage upon the same.

“I found in my last visit to Ohio, and have ascertained from Ohio men here with whom I have talked, that the Society is quite widely and favorably known in our mother state. We can say, without boasting, that the past of the Society is at least secure. For the good of our future, it is important that the favorable reputation of the Ohio Society of New York should be spread, and it should be spread on the soil where Buckeyes are planted and grow and from whence we must transplant them here and in years to come get that timber which has become so highly prized in the interior adornment of municipal and federal buildings in the East.

“Many of the friends of the Society believe that it would gain in each Ohio editor who would accept the terms of membership an earnest advocate of its aim and success. Receiving notices of the meetings from month to month, and having his name enrolled in the year book as one of its members, he would give the Society frequent and favorable mention in his journal and so bring it prominently before his readers. Being an editor, and acquainted with all the news of his locality, he would know the men in his community who, in Major McKinley’s felicitous phrase, propose to ‘hustle down East,’ and he would certainly counsel such men, when they get to New York to join his Society, if they get an opportunity. The amendment proposed offers other advantages to the Society.

“I am told that there are some of our members who call regularly at these rooms to look at the Ohio papers, which have been sent to us so generously by our loyal newspaper friends in Ohio. I am sure additional files would attract other members here and would afford frequent occasion for bringing some of the members together here and for promoting more active interest in the Society. The country editor we all know is in a sense the historian of his village and county. An Ohio editor, in the course of an exchange of letters with me recently, incidentally mentioned the fact that he was the secretary of an historical society which is one of the oldest in Ohio, and he offered to get and send to me such interesting historical matter as he could relating to his locality and his society. I dare say there are other journalists who, if they were members and advised of the historical objects of this Society, would put themselves in the way of getting for us interesting historical and descriptive literature and relics to place upon the shelves of our library and to hang upon our walls.

“The progress of the Society, in general as well as in detail, having been faithfully narrated in the reports presented by the other officers and committees, the secretary asks the Society to exercise toward him some degree of leniency for having consumed its time in a report which seems to be of things he has conceived might be rather than of things pertaining to his office, which he has done or left undone, and he respectfully submits the same for their merciful consideration.

“EVARTS L. PRENTISS, Secretary.”

The banquet given by the Society at Delmonico's to the Hon. William L. Strong, mayor-elect of the city of New York, occurred on December 4, 1894. The gentlemen already named had the matter in charge, and were assisted by a reception committee constituted as follows: David Homer Bates, H. B. Brundrett, H. A. Glassford, H. H. Hobbs, H. H. Brockway, Fulton McMahon, C. C. Shayne, W. H. Caldwell, F. H. Kingsbury, F. C. Train, A. W. Follett, Frank M. Foyé. There were six tables in addition to that devoted to the distinguished guests. At table A, George E. Armstrong sat at the head and William L. Brown at the foot; at table B, Andrew J. C. Foyé and Leander H. Crall; at C, S. S. Packard and William S. Hawk; at D, Milton I. Southard and Homer Lee; at E, E. C. Bodman and Warren Higley; at F, D. H. Bates and L. C. Hopkins.

Gen. Henry L. Burnett, president and toastmaster, was flanked on the right by the following gentlemen: Hon. William L. Strong, Hon. Seth Low, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, Hon. William J. Wallace, Hon. Clarence Lexow, Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, Gen. Thomas Ewing. On the left by Hon. William McKinley, Hon. John W. Goff, Hon. William R. Merriam, Hon. Calvin S. Brice, St. Clair McKelway, Joseph Larocque, Rev. Dr. Charles H. Babcock, Gen. Wager Swayne.

This notable gathering of friends to do honor to one of their number who had been elevated to high office after a campaign of great excitement can best be introduced by the following from the New York Tribune of the following day:

“In periods of political excitement the sonorous and good old Indian name of the Buckeye state, Ohio, is greatly liked by Republicans, and the Democrats do not like it at all. But when the Ohio men in this city come together at dinner, as they do generally once a year in February, political differences are not much thought of, and Democrats and Republicans alike cheer each other. The members of the Ohio Society this year forestalled their annual banquet by at least two months, and had a big complimentary dinner last evening in honor of Mayor-elect Strong. About two hundred of the sons of Ohio, the great majority of whom do not and never did hold an office, gathered in Delmonico's and cheered with enthusiasm whenever Colonel Strong's name was mentioned by any of the speakers. At a certain period of the evening, a little before the speaking began, some ladies came in, among them Mrs. Strong, and seats were found for them in the orchestra. Their handsome appearance formed an attractive background to the nicely arranged display of flags and bunting behind which they sat. S. S. Packard, who presided at one of the tables, jumped to his feet and waved his handkerchief, which was a signal for everybody else to do likewise, and this demonstration of welcome was supplemented by a hearty outburst of cheering.

“The tables were arranged at right angles to the long one, at which the chairman sat, and at the head of each one of these tables sat one of the vice-presidents of the Society, and at the other end one of the members of the dinner committee. Buckeye brown ribbons across the shirt front were worn by the members of the dinner committee, and a handsome souvenir, to which was glued an imitation buckeye, was carefully put away by each one as a memento of the occasion.”

The announced list of speakers and toasts was as follows:

President Henry L. Burnett, Toastmaster.

Mayor-elect William L. Strong, Guest.

1. President Seth Low, of Columbia College.
“Can a City be Governed on Business Principles?”
2. Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst.
“Eternal Vigilance, the Price of Purity.”
3. St. Clair McKelway, of the Brooklyn Eagle.
“The Greater New York.”
4. Hon. John W. Goff.
“Let There Be Light.”
5. Joseph Larocque, Esq.
“The Committee of Seventy.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The proceedings in full were as follows:

President Burnett: "Fellow Members of the Ohio Society and Guests:

"At the close of Colonel Strong's presidency of our Society, and as he was about to enter upon his duties as mayor of this great city, a universal desire was expressed that an opportunity should be given for all the members to meet him and take him by the hand; to express to him their gratitude for his long and manifold services to the Society, their esteem and affection for him as a man, and to declare their faith to the people of this city from their intimate knowledge of the man, that he will resolutely, cleanly and wisely discharge the duties of the important office to which he has been called.

"And our Society feels that under the circumstances it has a peculiar and special interest in this job—this cleaning of the Tammany Augean stable, and a good honest business government for our city.

"Coming here from our native state of Ohio, becoming citizens of this great city and state, rearing and educating our children under the city's government, its laws and influences, intending to live out our lives and work out our fortunes in your midst, we feel that we have as deep and abiding an interest in the prosperity, the good name, and honor of this great imperial city as any one born within her walls; and is it presumption in us to say that the descendants of the Revolutionary heroes and soldiers who in old Massachusetts formed the first Ohio Society and emigrated to and took up their homes on the banks of the beautiful river, and carved out their fortunes and a great empire there; is it 'cheek' in us, as our friend Mr. Depew or Mr. Choate might say, that we now, having returned and taken up our homes among you, have taken and propose to continue to take actively and earnestly a hand in the job of securing good government for the city of our adoption? But taking a hand may mean one thing to the average New York politician and a very different thing to a member of the Ohio Society. Touching Colonel Strong's election, one of the first acts of the Society, feeling that we were all warm personal friends of his, was to pass a resolution unanimously that no personal appeals should be made to him for office or favor by any member; that he should not be burdened or annoyed by applications or importunities by any of his friends of his old Society; that our duty and our work, yea, our pleasure, lay in uniting with all the good citizens in moral support of his administration, in aiding him to begin and carry through all genuine reforms, to enforce the law, to strengthen and support his arms in bearing high the banner of non-partisan and pure municipal government. We seek no offices, nor solicit them for our friends. Of course, even an Ohio man cannot help taking an office now and then if it is thrust upon him.

"But, turning from the Society to our guest, Colonel Strong. He is known well by every member of the Society, and in its nine years of existence no man has been more active or liberal in advancing its welfare, no member so well known and loved by all the 'boys.' We are all his warm friends, not only now that high office has been thrust upon him, but during all the time he has been with us and one of us.

"Some of our members have known him intimately since his boyhood out in Ohio, some associated with him for years in business. Those who have known him longest love him best. He has in the Society not one enemy, nor a lukewarm friend.

"Colonel Strong has in him good stuff for mayor. The committee of seventy builded wiser than it knew, Mr. Larocque, when it selected him as the standard-bearer of the great army of the people in their attack upon Tammany and storming of their entrenched positions in the offices of this city.

"We who know him well know that he is strong and resolute of will and tenacious of purpose. He is essentially honest-minded, honest in thought and action; honest with others, honest with himself; slow and deliberate in his mental operations; a judgment that waits on information, and yet at times astonishing his friends by the quickness and accuracy of his intuitions.

"If a question of policy or administration new to him were to be presented, he would probably be slow to answer. He would hear and like to hear from men whose intelligence and character he respected all they had to say upon the subject; and then, well, he'd think it over.

"While in quite a large measure he has something of that equable temper and stolid sturdy nature of Grant, he can and will at times be impatient and say 'no' with vehemence. This will occur when suggestions are made to him of action or administration that violate or run counter to his conviction of right; and on questions of right he will not always agree with the theorists. Like Lincoln, he is no idealist. 'The right which he sees will be a practical right, a right which can be compassed.'

"He is sturdy, inflexible, honest always.

"His active business life of forty years in this great city has made him a good judge of men—of character. A busy, active, hard-working merchant for many years, president of a large bank, director of one of the most important life insurance companies of this country, and director of one of the great trunk line railroads, he has been thoroughly schooled in the city's commerce, its property interests, its finances, and its transportation. He knows, as few men know, the city's needs and its resources. He is well equipped for the work before him.

"Finally, you will find him warm of heart, a 'kindly man among his kind,' in close touch and sympathy with the plain people and all who toil; and also you will find that in digging out corruption, the vile and vicious from their lurking places, he will have long and sharp nails, but clean hands. And he has that rare quality most valuable in places of power in public or private life—uncommon common sense. I introduce Col. Strong.”

Mayor Strong said: “About forty years ago, in Ohio, Mr. President and brother Buckeyes, I attended a little dinner, I think of about twenty-five or thirty people, and we had nothing to eat but bear meat (laughter), and that is why the dinner was given. We had got a bear. Now, gentlemen, from the looks of these tables and the absence of provisions, you have changed the order—have taken the meat away and left the dishes bare. This is a distinction with a difference. (Laughter and applause.)

“Gentlemen, I am quite at a loss to know just how to handle myself on this occasion. You ‘boys’ have got the advantage of me. In the first place, I don’t think that I feel in the best humor. I suppose I understand the reason. As soon as my nomination was made for mayor, this Ohio Society had a meeting and elected a nominating committee to name a new president, and no sooner was I elected mayor than they kicked me out.

“I was one of the charter members of this Society, and, strange as it may seem, I have been an officer ever since it was formed, until last Friday night, when, on account of having been elected mayor, I was reduced to the ranks. I did not know before that an Ohio man is never allowed to take office without being kicked out of all the societies of which he is a member. I have already left two, I believe—not left, but quietly been shuffled out just as I have been out of the presidency of this Society. I never did quite know why this dinner was gotten up, unless it was to buy me off! I suspect that one or two of my friends sitting here on my right said, ‘We will give the Colonel a nice Delmonico banquet, and that will make it all right.’

“But, gentlemen, the tender recollections that will hover around the Ohio Society while I am in the ranks will not make me any the less zealous for its success. I shall be delighted always to have the pleasure of being with you at your meetings, for I know of no place where a real genuine Buckeye can have quite so good a time as he can at 236 Fifth avenue.

“I am rather inclined to think that after the fulsome discourse of your president, my mouth is pretty well sealed. I cannot afford to say much. My own impression is that in about three years from now you gentlemen will be mighty sorry that you gave me this dinner. (Laughter.) In olden times, as you remember, they put laurel wreaths on the brows of their heroes when they returned from battle; and when the statesman had accomplished some great good for the state he was similarly honored. But you have reversed the order. And more than this, you seem determined to dine and wine me until you make me entirely unfit to take the position to which you have elected me. I say ‘you,’ for I have not seen a man in the Ohio Society who did not vote for me. In fact, I have seen but two men in the city of New York who said they didn’t!

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ Now, your president referred to a resolution gotten up by my friend, Mr. Packard, and unanimously adopted for the purpose of not embarrassing me after I got into the office, saying in substance that no member of the Ohio Society should ask for an appointment either for himself or for another. Well, you will remember there was one gentleman who hurried out before that resolution was read, and came back and voted for it. He had seen me; but as all applications that have been made to me have been made under the sacred seal of confidence, I shall call no names.

“ During the campaign there was a little thing occurred that I will relate here. I may have mentioned it to some of my friends of the Ohio Society; and I am sorry our friend is not here to testify to its truth. He was making a speech at Cooper Institute, and was describing the immense hospitality of his candidate for mayor, as he had enjoyed it down at the seashore. He said we sat on the piazza with the broad ocean before us and about two fingers of sarsaparilla in our glasses. Well, the next morning, there were four or five gentlemen from the East Side who came to the bank, and one of them said, ‘ Now, look here, Mr. Strong, you must call that man off.’ ‘ That man ’ was Mr. Fred. Taylor. ‘ You must call him right off. No more sarsaparilla in this campaign. It may do well enough to run a bank, or a dry goods business, but when you get into the mayor’s chair, you must have something a little more tony than sarsaparilla.’ (Laughter.)

“ Gentlemen, it is useless for me to try to express my feelings on this occasion. I could not do it. The compliment you have paid me is more than I can stand.” (Cheers and much applause.)

President Burnett: “ In the early days of Louis XIV., to those who doubted his future Cardinal Mazarin declared ‘ that they did not know him, and that there was stuff enough in him to make four kings and an honest man.’ I think we may say of Colonel Strong that he has in him the stuff for four ordinary mayors and always an honest man left over.

“ In the experiment of the government of cities upon business principles, there has been one eminent example in this country. That was Brooklyn, under the administration of a gentleman present with us to-night, and to all students of municipal administration that example has been pointed out as one conspicuous in its success—as successful as was possible under the great body of law under which that municipality had to be administered, a body of law not formed for independent or business government, but passed by each party when in power more or less in its own interests. Of that administration and the experience of that gentleman, we shall hear to-night. There has been added to the wealth of our hoardings his citizenship—he has become a part of New York, thank God! (Applause.) He is now at the head of our great institution of learning, Columbia College, and he gives to it the wealth of his knowledge and experience—not only that, but is training up our young Americans, the heirs presumptive and the heirs apparent of this great republic, who are so soon to enter into their royal inheritance, and teaching them high standards of civic duty.

“I have the honor to introduce President Low.”

Seth Low said: “Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: It is very good of you to permit a mere New Yorker to be present on this occasion of your rejoicing, and yet I must remind you that New York, cosmopolitan New York, was true to her best self when she followed the leadership of Colonel Strong to victory a week or two ago. It is at once the strength and the glory of this city that she takes that which is good from all other parts of this Union and makes it a part of her own life and her own power.

“I confess, gentlemen, to being surprised at one thing that I have heard since being here. I do not know how it may be with college students, but college presidents who are worth anything are always ready to learn. And I have learned with amazement that the Ohio Society has determined that no other Ohio man shall hold office in the city of New York. I had supposed that the Ohio man went into his back-yard every day and put his ear to the ground to see if he could not hear his country calling him. (Great laughter and applause.) But it is evident that we of New York only partially understand the Ohio man, even now. Nevertheless, I knew him well enough, Mr. President, to be confident, when I learned that Colonel Strong was an Ohio man, that he would be elected. A long and careful watchfulness of political events in this country had led me to believe that the ordinary man who faces a man from Ohio, either in battle or in a political contest, deserves the comment of the locomotive engineer who observed a bull charging his engine. He said, ‘I admire your pluck, but I must condemn your judgment.’

“But, gentlemen, I have been asked whether it is possible to conduct a city upon business principles. If I shall not discourage the mayor-elect, I should say in some senses yes, and in some senses no. To try to make clear the sense in which other elements come into such a task than those which a man is accustomed to in business, I must recall a conversation that I had with Mr. Beecher after I had sat in the mayor’s office of Brooklyn for two or three years. He said, ‘Well, Mr. Mayor, how are the politicians feeling?’ ‘Well,’ I said, ‘Mr. Beecher, I do not know that I am very good authority on that point. If I were to make a guess, I should say that those who are in office feel all right, and those who are out are a little discontented.’ (Laughter.) Well, he laughed, and said it reminded him of what he used to see in Indiana when he was located there. In those days large droves of hogs wandered around, and in winter-time ate the mast, the acorns that fell from the trees; and when cold weather came they all gathered up into a bunch. ‘Now,’ he said, ‘Mr.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Low, it is most singular, but I never saw such a bunch of those interesting animals where the inside hog did not appear to be perfectly quiescent and satisfied, while the whole outer ring was in a state of discontent.' Of course, if I had not heard of the resolution passed by the Ohio Society, I should not have ventured to tell the anecdote in this presence. (Renewed laughter.) That is to say, gentlemen, that in the government of a city elements do enter—whether they should or not, they do enter—into the problem that do not attach themselves to the conduct of a private business. What seems to me to differentiate public life from private in any capacity is this, that in public life there exists an organized opposition that tries to make you fail just as much when you ought to succeed as when you deserve to fail. It does not want you to succeed, because if you succeed you gather prestige and power that may be dangerous to the opposition. Now a business man has competition to face, but he does not have that; and it is an influence that necessarily affects public life and differentiates it in some respects from any private occupation. I found that public life was a life of Rembrandt effects. The lights are very strong and bright. What can be more stirring to the heart of a man competent to feel it than the applause of a great metropolis like this? On the other hand, what is more trying than the criticism of your neighbors; the falsehoods that often circulate about men charged with difficult and responsible duties? One has to steel himself against it, to bear himself as though he were absolutely unconscious of all these false things that are being said, and that is why I say that it is a life of Rembrandt effects. The shadows are dark because the light that casts them is very bright. But there is a sense, gentlemen, in which a city can be administered on business principles, I am sure. But before I approach that let me try to make clear to you by a historical survey what I conceive to be the overwhelming significance of the election of our friend. In 1814 the mayor of the city of New York was not an elective officer. He was appointed by the State Council of Appointment, a body that consisted of the governor of the state and of four senators chosen by the lower house of the legislature. A body so composed removed from the mayor's office of New York city in 1814 so considerable a man as De Witt Clinton, who a few years later constructed the Erie Canal. They put into his place the then president of the Tammany Society, under an arrangement by which that gentleman was to receive in a few weeks from the national government the appointment of surveyor of the port of New York, when he was to be succeeded by still a different man. The bargain was carried out to the letter. In other words, away back there in 1814 the city was used as a pawn in the game of national politics. That was at a time when the mayor was not elected, therefore it did not involve universal suffrage; it was at a time when there had not been any very great and marked immigration, therefore it did not involve the question of the foreign vote. It simply illustrates how deep-seated among Americans is the habit of allowing their cities to be second in their thoughts—or rather it showed the habit of that day, of using the city, as I said, as a pawn in the game of national politics. Now what followed? That incident and others like it led men to say, ‘Well, this State Council of Appointment will do such a thing because it is not local to the city, but if the city could select its own mayor, then the interests of the city would be paramount.’ So in 1821, when the constitution of the state was revised, they gave the election of mayor to the common council. But lo! when the mayor was chosen in that way the common council did the same thing—the city was second. It was always an influence, a ‘make-weight’ in some national or state enterprise, and so men said, ‘Well, if the people of the city were to choose their own mayor, then the interests of the city would be paramount indeed,’ and so in 1835 the mayor of the city of New York was elected by the people for the first time. Then what happened? Why, precisely the same thing went on, and from that day until the last election the people of the city of New York have subordinated the welfare of the city to their interest in state or national politics; and therefore the great significance of our victory on election day, it seems to me, is this, that for the first time in the history of this city large numbers of the majority party have said, ‘We are going to stand for the welfare of New York city if it wrecks our party in the state and nation forever.’ (Applause.) Just think of it! Two years ago the Democratic party gave their candidate for mayor a majority of over 70,000, and Colonel Strong is elected by 45,000. (Cries of ‘Good!’) I want to say, gentlemen, that that gives the new mayor a great opportunity and lays upon him an equal obligation. For the first time the people of New York at the ballot-box have said to their mayor, ‘You must be mayor of New York before you are a partisan.’ (Applause.) It is the very first time that this great city in all its history has delivered that message to its chief magistrate.

“I hope that in this presence and on this occasion I may venture to illustrate the rest of my theme out of my own experience. I think I knew the business of Brooklyn during the period of my mayoralty as well as A. T. Stewart knew his business. The foundation of that knowledge was this device to which I resorted. I opened a complaint-book in my office. Whenever I received a complaint from any citizen, high or low, it was acknowledged by a postal-card saying that the complaint had been received and had been referred to the proper department for investigation. The complaint was then forwarded to the department with a request that they would examine and report. If the answer stated that the complaint was either not well founded or admitted of no remedy, the citizen who made it was given that information, with the opportunity to point out to me, if he pleased, in a conference whether the department was right or wrong in its judgment. If the department said that the complaint would be attended to, the citizen who made it received a postal-card saying that such and such a department had said his complaint would be attended to and the trouble remedied in a few days; would he be kind enough to report to the mayor's office whether it was done or not? Now under that system I knew whether the street-cleaning was well done, just as the barometer shows the pressure of the air. The whole population of the city was on watch. I am sorry to say that the street-cleaning was not always well done, but, nevertheless, the complaints varied, and they varied as to the section of the city they came from just in proportion to the thoroughness and effectiveness of the work that was being done at that time by the department. It gave me the judgment of the city, the current judgment of the people, as to the actual working and efficiency of the department. That is something that can be done by any man. But I had one advantage which Colonel Strong has not yet, by law, but which he will have, I am sure, if the will of the people is carried out. I had the opportunity to appoint every head of department, and therefore I was able to make an administration which I was not only willing to be responsible for, but for which I was obliged to be responsible. The heads of departments met in my office every Wednesday to go over the minutes of the common council. Not a resolution was passed by that body during all my term that was not subjected to the criticism of the entire city government, and it was not an infrequent thing that one department would throw a side-light on a matter touching another. This charter brought about unity in the city government. It made it work as one, instead of expecting efficiency from a machine that consisted of so many separate departments. Now let me point out to you that under such a charter as New York has at this moment the Tammany Society, with its control of all the departments, has been the only force making for unity and efficiency in the city government. How could you conduct a great mill, how could you conduct a great business, if the head of every department was free to do his will without any reference to the next man, perhaps engaged in an amiable effort to thwart him just when he ought to succeed? I have known departments to be attacking each other in the public press because each commissioner felt himself supreme in his own sphere. I have sometimes thought that the so-called boss justified his existence more in that direction than in any other, in that by his common control over all the officials he has brought unity to the administration of the system. But it is a far better way to get your unity hand in hand with responsibility, and not put it into the pocket of an irresponsible party chieftain. (Applause.) That is why the mayor of a city ought to have the power to appoint his heads of departments and the power to remove them; because, just as soon as you put a department into the hands of a man out of sympathy with the chief executive, your machine begins to run like a stage-coach with a shoe on the wheel. You might as well expect the heavenly bodies to keep out of collision without the law of gravity as to expect unity and efficiency in administration from a charter that divides up administration into a lot of departments, the head of everyone of which feels independent of the mayor and of everybody else. Just look at the situation as it exists. Assuming that no such law is possible, how can Colonel Strong carry on the city government with every department in the hands of men attempting to thwart him at every step? Therefore, it seems to me that if you are to have business principles in the conduct of the mayor's office, you have got to organize your city government on business principles. Those principles are very simple as they apply to this case. Wherever executive work is to be done, put it in the hands of one man. Our forefathers did not make a non-partisan commission to administer the war department; they did not do it to administer the post-office department; they did not do it to administer the treasury department. They acted in accordance with that principle which the experience of mankind has universally sustained. Why, the Romans had eleven aqueducts to supply their city with water, and all of those aqueducts were under the charge of a single man. No people have ever illustrated magnificent administration in affairs of government better than they. There is another principle as simple as that: that in a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. Wherever the work is discretionary rather than executive, have a board; but where it is executive in the main, have one man. I see it stated that we cannot have a single head for the police department, because they have charge of the elections. Don't let them have charge of the elections, then, and appoint a board for that purpose, and let it be a board that has no other business; then it can be watched effectively; and let the police commissioner run the police. The two things do not necessarily go together. They do not go together as matter of fact in Brooklyn; and they need not go together in New York. Now, gentlemen, if we expect a successful administration from our new mayor—and we do expect it and pray for it, and we will help you to effect it, Colonel Strong—if we are to take that attitude, let us see to it that the mayor has a business charter to administer, and give him conditions under which business principles can be expected to work out good results." (Much applause.)

President Burnett: "Our banquet committee knew who were our friends and friends of the people. Mr. Packard, Mr. Foyé, Mr. Crall and Mr. Lee exercised a very wise discretion when they said to themselves, 'There are many men in this city who at this time will have a message to deliver to the people, and this will be a fitting occasion for that message to be delivered.' And we thank President Low for that message which he has delivered to the people of New York and this state.

"I am sorry to find that President Low, like many Eastern people, has not yet quite comprehended an Ohio man. While it is true we have passed a resolution that we will neither for ourselves nor our friends add to the burden of our friend and late president by soliciting favors from him, we have not passed on to that point where we have said that when the good people of New York come in a body and 'snatch an Ohio man by the scruff of his neck' as it were from his retirement, and say, 'You must serve us,' that he will refuse. Oh, no, that's not the kind of patriots we are.

"In the great powers of government the second, if not the first, power in the state is the press. We little, perhaps, comprehend how much our daily action is governed by what we read in our daily papers, how much our actions are based and our ideas formed upon what we there read, and I am sorry to say that the editors of papers—papers are not turned out merely by machinery, but with some great informing mind behind each sheet—do not comprehend the power they wield or the duty that rests upon their shoulders. In modern days, I am glad to say, many of the great papers of the country are rising to the occasion and are independently and honestly trying to lead and inform the people. Conspicuous among those editors, it is honor due to state, there has been one independent editor in Brooklyn who has independently voiced the demands of the people. That editor is with us to-night, and from him we would like to hear upon one special subject, and a little upon the subject I have just spoken of. We have thought here in New York that New York ought to be before the world as great as she is in fact, one of the great imperial cities of the world. We have held out the hand to Brooklyn to come in and be a part of the Greater New York. Brooklyn, for some reason which we have not quite comprehended, has been coy in this mating. Why this has been so we do not quite understand, and our friend and great editor, St. Clair McKelway, will tell us something about it." (Much applause.)

Mr. McKelway said: "Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

"When Mr. Packard, the man with the marble brow and the glad hand, summoned me to this duty, and when I read that General Burnett was to preside on this occasion, I said, 'I have always been able to deal with my traducers, but for once I will be at the mercy of my introducers.' The tribute which the General pays to the editor of the morning newspaper can be endorsed by me because I am the editor of an evening newspaper. He says very truly that the newspapers are not brought out merely by machinery. In truth, if machines had their way newspapers would not be brought out at all. (Laughter.) A citizen of Brooklyn—a citizen, as I may say, of East New York—addressing the Ohio Society in West Brooklyn, feels that sense of geographical derangement which an applicant for the far too hasty naturalization until lately disbursed at the City Hall felt when he unhesitatingly swore without the fear of the Lexow committee or its counsel before his eyes, that he was the son of an Irish mother and a French father, who was born on a Dutch sloop under the Spanish flag in Chinese waters. (Laughter.) Such a juxtaposition of ethnological circumstances is like the Ohio idea in New York. Now, if that great state is not satisfied, what in the world does it want? It has the mayoralty of the metropolis; it has the third senator from this commonwealth (laughter), and when Colonel Strong pathetically spoke about the election of a new president, Governor McKinley loudly applauded. With such a cinch as this in possession and in perpetuity, all the real estate should belong to the Buckeye commonwealth, because the meek shall inherit the earth.

“I remember, gentlemen, the first output of the Ohio idea in this city. It was on the morning of the 14th of April, 1865. I then, as a law student in the office of Samuel Blatchford, mingled with the thousands—I might say with the millions—that crowded these streets, heart beating against heart, eye interrogating eye, because of a calamity that had fallen on our nation. No longer was a President going to power amid the falling pillars of a dissolving Union. The Union had been saved, but the magnitude of the achievement, in the death of a great President, had been forgotten. Many were the words that were spoken in front of the custom-house that day, whose pillars patriotic hands had before covered with emblems of mourning. Some of them were words that lashed the heart to fury, but the words that were most appropriate were those words spoken and to be recalled now of one man, himself so little known that his name had to be told by Mr. Wadsworth, the chairman, to the throng, and as he stood there, master of his mind and, therefore, master of men’s souls that day, he said that the act of a bravo was not the crime of a section, that although the President was dead, God reigned and the government at Washington still lived. And from the pronunciation of that Ohio idea, men went away heavy of heart, but with reason redominating them at that time. Some years afterward, that very man, for the offence of desiring to place an agent of his own choice in that building from whose steps he had stilled the wrath of men, was himself violently assassinated. That was the climax of the spoils system in America. Last November was the climax of the anti-spoils system in the city of New York. Will the people of New York resent dictation to their mayor-elect from political bosses, as they were prepared to resent dictation to the President, had not death sealed his efforts on the threshold of his office? I believe that with Colonel Strong’s motto of bear and forbear his administration will be a success, especially if in sarsaparilla only he keeps loaded for bear during the three years of his office.

“I was surprised at your chairman declaring that the function of a college president was to teach young ideas how to shoot. Manifestly it is to teach them how to kick. But I was not surprised when President Low solemnly warned the mayor-elect not to look for any office. The next governorship is reserved for the other side of the river. Thus, by easy stages, I approach my text.

“I have been asked to talk about Greater New York. New York is already great. The achievements of New York energy almost equal Brooklyn Heights. New York can be made and kept greater, can remain and become Greater New York. This project and this duty have nothing whatever to do with consolidation. Great is a word of moral, and not of material import. It has become associated with consolidation by a lust for largeness, by a beatification of bigness, by a sometimes maudlin and a sometimes morbid mouthing of the meritoriouness of mere magnitude. It may or it may not bring about consolidation, but whether or not it does on that ground, it will not bring it about with the most commendable motive. There may be moral reform and economic arguments for consolidation that I shall here neither affirm nor deny, but I have to say that this lust for mere largeness which I have spoken of is not sentimental, but sordid. It is characteristic more of speculators than of statesmen, more of demagogues than of wise politicians. The populous cities of this world have been inland cities—London, Paris, Berlin, Moscow, Old Rome, of the magnitude of which, and of the home-rule principle of one-man-power in which, President Low has spoken; earlier than that, Babylon and Nineveh—perhaps earlier than that Jerusalem and the other cities in the Holy Land. This may or may not be a law. If it is a law, a temporary spurt against it will not permanently avail. My own duty toward consolidation I shall consider where it meets me, where I live. My object in addressing you to-night is to show that great New York can become Greater New York mainly if not only by what New Yorkers do in New York and for New York. That may be retarded or opposed at Albany. It cannot be long defeated there. It may be retarded or interfered with by politicians. They cannot long stand in the way of it. There is only one thing additional to what you have now that you really need in the way of laws, and that is a home-rule charter, giving your mayor the power to appoint all heads of departments as we have in Brooklyn; giving your mayor, as we have not in Brooklyn, the power, for cause and on hearing, himself to remove all heads of departments, with no appeal from his act except to the people who made him. There is a duty that you owe to this man, and that is the duty of organization, of continued organization, of moral and sympathetic support. Your enemies will teach you a lesson in that respect. They are as well organized now for the next fight as they were for the last fight. The devil always sleeps, if at all, with one eye open. The spoilsmen are always ready and always organized. Good men generally dream or snore between elections. If you will systematize, organize, perpetuate, and in all moral and earnest ways keep alive the enthusiasm and the energy which you displayed in November, the future of New York beyond the three years of the term of this man will be as secure as during the three years you have elected him to large duties, to great opportunities, to corresponding obligations, and to immense responsibilities. You can fritter away your triumph. One way will be a dispute between the Seventy and the Good Government Clubs as to which did the more to gain the victory. It was gained by both; it was gained for neither. (Cries of 'Good!') It was gained for all the people. It was gained as truly for those who opposed it and whom it delivered as it was for those who won it and who thereby delivered themselves. Now they say you are going to have opposition at Albany. You probably will. A Brooklyn man speaking to an audience like this feels like a member of the church triumphant addressing the members of the church militant, and thus addressing your militant spirit let me tell you only to want what is right in Albany, and then if you apparently are not to get it there, don't waste much time there. Come down to New York, call mass-meetings in Cooper Union and Chickering Hall. Put your best speakers to the front and demand the reason why the best thought, the best character, the best capacity of this delivered city cannot have its way through the law-making power of the state. Make the political existence of the leaders dependent upon their right doing, and you will find that they will prefer submission to suicide. Another way by which you may weaken your victory will be prematurely to strive for the eviction of public transgressors—to do so too soon, by getting the wrong man to bring the wrong charges before the wrong functionaries for the eviction of their fellows or of other fellows from place. The theory that the clown of the menagerie can induce the tiger to change some of his stripes is of all delusions the extreme. He doesn't gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles, nor reform grapes from Tammany roots. This mistake, but for the Providential brevity of the time between sentence and its execution, would be serious. The inrush at Albany of fresh air on the 1st of January will dispel divided purpose and bring the sunlight of united action. Old things will have passed away, and all things will have become new. The mere existence of good government as a fact will be an advantage you can hardly exaggerate. The force of that fact will be Strong. The influence of that fact will constantly augment. Now there is one thing that you must have, and that is you must have a backbone government. I trust and believe that this man of your choice has a backbone. (Cries of 'You are right!') If he hasn't, let him advertise for one. And talking of advertisements, I am here for business. He owes everything to all the people and nothing to any one of them. [Cries of 'Good!'] He helps them all when he best satisfies his own consciousness and his own judgment. [Cries of 'Good!'] He is under obligation to all and under dictation to none. Now when you have cleaned house, when you have swept and garnished your apartments, when you have permanently prevented the return of the more than seven evil spirits that would make your last estate worse than the first, when you have appreciated what must be done to keep New York great, and to make your city Greater New York, consolidation will not be out of order, and may I be there to see!" [Applause and cheers.]

President Burnett: "You see now the power that is in the press and how important it is to the people that a clear and clean intellect should inspire and inform its pages.

"For the great achievement and victory that has come to the people of New York there have been many agencies at work. The representatives of the press and the pulpit were almost unanimous in their efforts in behalf of the right as against the wrong. The committee of seventy did a great work, but perhaps there was no single agency more potent than that power of the state, the legislative committee sent to this city to investigate and place before the people of the city the facts, which they would not otherwise have believed to exist, although they passed by and touched them each day of their lives. They could hardly understand and little believed in the existence of vice and corruption that had crept into our public life, and would not have believed it had it not been established by overwhelming evidence. For that work the people of this city owe a debt of gratitude beyond all measure and all measurement to one man, and that man is with us to-night. He brought before that committee the witnesses who, by their testimony, lifted up the eyes of the people to the malefactors—and, fellow-citizens, to that instrument of our enfranchisement, who has done this good and great work, the people have said, 'Go up higher.' I need not introduce to either Ohio boys in New York, or to New York citizens, John W. Goff." [Cheers.]

Mr. Goff said: "Mr. President and Gentlemen:

"I also received a note from Mr. Packard, he of the 'marble brow'—though until now I did not know that the gentle accent, speaking through the typewriter, was the voice of the man I have heard speak facetiously on several occasions—and he warned me that if I was not here at a certain hour to-night I would miss my dinner. It was the most inhospitable warning I ever received coming to a banquet; and I did miss my dinner, and I have not had my dinner, Mr. Chairman. I was detained in court until nearly seven o'clock to-night, and I have to apologize to the committee for my failure to be here at the time mentioned in the note. But I was detained, gentlemen, in a meritorious work, in my opinion. I was making my best endeavors to help a Tammany commissioner to vindicate himself. And indeed I had some feeling of compassion for that gentleman when I left the room to-night; but it does not equal my compassion for the unfortunate city of New York, since I have heard her so calmly dissected, her wounds bound up, plaster administered, and the last but not least, my friend McKelway's spoonful of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup. Pity

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

New York! Between Brooklyn on the east and Ohio on the west, where is she?

“We have heard from our eloquent college president, Mr. Low, and as our president of the evening said New York tries to get everything that is good, we have tried to get the able Mr. Low. We have succeeded in doing that, and I think that the time is not very far distant when we will follow up that advantage by getting over Mr. McKelway. Mr. Low gave us some leaves out of the book of his experience, meant as an aid to our distinguished guest. Why, he said, ‘Mr. Strong, I wish you to remember this,’ in effect. ‘I kept a complaint-book, and in that complaint-book were registered the letters and complaints of our citizens upon every conceivable topic of municipal administration. I could tell how my streets were being cleaned and how our other departments were being administered just as truly as I could tell the weather by the rise and fall of the barometer.’ I sincerely hope to-night, and I say it with all sincerity and earnestness, that Mayor Strong will not open a complaint-book on the Brooklyn principle, because our distinguished President Low failed to remember this fact, that one of the very best and energetic mayors that New York has ever had, Mr. Hewitt, opened a very large-sized complaint-book, and he was in more hot water than any man has ever been since, or before. And further, the simile does not follow—New York is not Brooklyn. Why, of course that complaint-book was well attended to. There could not be many complaints, however, in the Brooklyn complaint-book, for we all know that our Brooklyn friends come over to New York to kick, and then go to Brooklyn to sleep, and even when our junior friends wish to select a stamping ground after business hours they come over to New York, and it is from there all the complaints arise. Why, one speaker has said to-night that Brooklyn was coy in joining her municipal destinies with New York. Did any of you gentlemen ever notice one of the charming, handsome women of Brooklyn when they arrive at Fulton Ferry or at the Bridge? They invariably gather their skirts about them, fearing to be touched by New York mud. Of course Brooklyn is coy! And all the married men of Brooklyn want her to remain coy, because if there was consolidation, what in God’s name could the married men of Brooklyn give as an excuse to their wives for remaining out late? I noticed that our friend, Mr. McKelway, when he came to that point, was exceedingly non-committal. He said: ‘I will meet the question of consolidation in the proper place!’ [Laughter.] And mark you that in the same breath with that he said: ‘If there are any advertisements lying around loose I am here for business!’ What a beautiful and unconscious illustration of that which we have often heard in the criticisms of the public press, that the editorial end of the concern was largely influenced by the business end.

“I remember just now a sentence of Mr. Low, in his classic speech, where he made an allusion to ancient Rome. He said, ‘Why, Rome had its eleven aqueducts.' I presume some of you gentlemen have heard—I know Mr. Packard has—that story of the speech of Daniel Webster, delivered at a dinner given to him in Rochester at the Falls of the Genesee? I dare not repeat it here. But you will remember that, with all those eleven aqueducts, Rome had never its aqueduct commission! And then, Mr. Low, in his speech, rather favored bossism in certain aspects—rather inclined to the view that the boss was a beneficent being. Students and philosophers lean to the theory, many of them, and the contention seems to have a great deal of strength to support it, that the best government on the face of the earth is that of the paternal and beneficent despot. Possibly Mr. Low had that in his mind; but we cannot have that government now in New York, not at least for the next three years, because the government of the most despotic autocrat that ever existed in any city in any civilized country could not have surpassed the government that we have passed through in New York for the past two or four years. Mr. Strong can never be enthroned as a boss in New York. Bossism has been broken, and let every true friend of honest municipal government send up a hearty prayer that its death-knell for eternity in our country has been sounded.

“Coming in the door I caught a few sentences of Mr. Strong’s address. I am becoming very much interested in Mr. Strong’s speeches, or rather talks—they are not speeches, they are talks, delightful, social, confidential talks; and he seems to take his hearers into his confidence—and from the first time I heard him in the campaign, up to this very night, inclusive, he has been improving, and if he continues he will blossom out into one of the best after-dinner orators in New York. A delightful little speech I heard him make last Saturday night, in the presence of an assemblage in which were contained gentlemen of political power and influence in our city and state. He said with delightful simplicity, after reciting that the Committee of Seventy laid claim to him, that the Committee of Thirty of the Republican party laid claim to him; that the Millhollandites laid claim to him; that the O’Brienites told him he belonged to them; that the Stecklerites said, ‘We own you, body and soul;’ Mr. Platt said, ‘I have got a great big mortgage upon you;’ the Grace Democracy said, ‘We own you completely.’ ‘Gentlemen, I will be perfectly willing to let you and each one of you do as you please, provided you let me do as I please.’ I thought that was a pretty good indication of the man. What a delightful condition that will be! We all may do as we please, and Mayor Strong will do as he pleases; and if he does as he pleases I am satisfied that the fear he expressed to-night, that at the end of his administration you would not give him a dinner, will not be realized. He said to-night with some feeling, ‘Possibly at the end of my administration you may not wish to banquet me.’ True it is we have had in this city mayors who have gone in with great éclat, their praise sounded, their biographies written, their grandmothers described as the handsomest women that ever trod God's footstool, their small vices magnified into great virtues, and yet at the expiration of their terms they have left the chair with the malediction of every politician in the city of New York. But Mayor Strong says, 'If I can do as I please I will let you do as you please,' and when he said to-night with that sense of feeling, 'I fear you will not give me a dinner when I get through,' it was a passing sentence at a banquet where good cheer pervades, but there was pathos in it, because the people, after all, are frequently fickle. They raise up a god upon a pedestal to-day, and crash it to the floor to-morrow. Charles I. had a triumphant entry into London, when several deaths are reported to have taken place owing to the pressure of the crowd to kiss the hem of his garment; and exactly one year after that terrible crush deaths also occurred from the terrible pressure of the crowd to get near him and spear him.

"Popular idols are dangerous things. Popular devotion frequently turns into popular unrestraint. During these weeks preceding Mayor Strong's administration, we are all disposed to join in the acclaim of praise following victory, but let us resolve ourselves into a committee of the whole, not only to give praise to Mayor Strong, but to unite with him and hold up his arms throughout the whole of his term, if he carries out his expressed determination to do what is right. Aye, even though the Ohio man has to suppress his native-born instincts, referred to by Mr. Low, let him do it. I never thought Mr. Low such a sly joker. I remarked, when he said he never knew an Ohio man but went out into his back-yard and put his ear to the ground to listen for the voice of a nation calling upon him, that he gave a sly glance at Governor McKinley. Well, if Mayor Strong had his ear to the ground to listen to the voice of the people of New York calling him, he heard the call, and as has been well said to-night, for the first time in the history of our city the people called. One hundred and fifty thousand of the best men in our city, the flower of our municipal life, a magnificent army, marched to the polls on election day and gave Mayor Strong a commission such as no mayor has ever had in this city of New York. Every earnest friend of good government will aid him in the enforcement of that commission. Even I myself will aid him to the best of my ability, though at the commencement I had a slight grievance against Mayor Strong—not personally, but partially of a national character, because I have heard in this hall eloquent and witty after-dinner speakers on St. Patrick's night say that the Irish had captured New York, and in fact that New York's name should be changed by the transposition of the letter 'Y.' Put 'C' in its place and it could be called New Cork. Well, for some years we have had in our chief magistrate's chair a distinguished representative of my nationality, of which I am proud—of my nationality, I mean. And in the early days of the campaign your humble servant's name was mentioned as a candidate for the mayoralty. It looked to me that the old saying that 'God is good to the Irish' was yet to be verified. I was suddenly lifted into the realm of greatness. I began to think that it would be necessary to hunt up my genealogy and to get out the tree of my pedigree in illustrated magazines, when all at once and without the slightest indication of his coming, an Ohio man crossed my horizon, and Ireland was not in it. Will it come to the mouths of some brilliant after-dinner speakers to say at your next anniversary dinner that Ohio to come extent has been depopulated by the exodus of its citizens to New York because one of its sons occupies our chair? I welcome Ohioans to New York if we can get them all like Colonel Strong. Let them come, and, particularly, I open the gate for them as candidates for enlistment in our reorganized police department!

"If you forget it, gentlemen, I do not—I have not had my dinner yet, and therefore I must, in justice to my dinner, abbreviate. Let me say here one or two words touching upon the subject so well set forth by Mr. McKelway. While it is true that Mayor Strong does not belong to any faction, yet it is well that those elements that so nobly and generously fought for his election shall have their say. I do not believe in men being smothered. It is because we in New York for several years have been smothered that the boss has flourished and that the people have been degraded. Let us have good, healthy sentiment. Let us have the good American rule of men speaking out in meeting. Is it healthy, it is productive of the expansion of lung-power, and wherever lung-power has had full expansion, revolutions and cut-throat plots have never prospered. Secret political societies can never exist where men have the right to speak out. So long as the men of New York, Republicans, Democrats, Good Government men, citizens of no particular party, but all men joining shoulder to shoulder and going in that grand procession, in that grand army, to the polls on election day, so long as those men can continue to march we are safe. I think that the overwhelming sentiment in New York to-day among Republicans, Independent Democrats, all except those who expect to go—I think the overwhelming sentiment is that Mayor Strong's arms must be upheld and adequate power given to those arms to carry out the mandate of the people given at the last election.

"I trust, gentlemen, that if the Ohio Society in honoring the man from your state—the first from the state that has ever, I believe, occupied our chief magistrate's chair—that if the men from Ohio wish to determine to aid their kinsman, if I might so call him, let them join together in the movement to sustain his administration. But we must necessarily have some disputes. We might as well expect in a Presidential convention the Buckeyes and the Hoosiers to agree what state shall name the Presidential candidate as to expect that we in New York shall keep quiet from discussing the ways and means to obtain the desired end. Let us discuss them, let us talk of them, but let us keep one thing in view—let it be our guiding star, as fixed in its determination as the star of the north is to the pole, that so far as we can, irrespective of party, the degrading, debasing rule of Tammany Hall or its minions will never again triumph in this city in our generation.” [Applause.]

President Burnett: “Associated in the minds of the people in the great work of arousing public sentiment to the duty of cleaning this Augean stable is one man who blazed the way and led in the fight. I speak of Dr. Parkhurst. [Applause.] He expected to have been with us to-night and to have addressed you, but owing to a death in his family he could not come. We have from him a letter, addressed to the chairman of the banquet committee, Mr. Packard, and that letter I will ask him to read.”

Mr. Packard: “Mr. President, I am aware that I am asked to read Dr. Parkhurst’s letter, and I propose to do it before I take my seat. Nevertheless, there is such a thing as a question of privilege, and I avail myself of it.

“Allusions have been made to a resolution offered by me at a meeting of the Ohio Society, which committed the members of that Society to a certain course of action, or rather of inaction. The resolution is no longer mine, as it was passed unanimously, and has become one of our laws. I fear, however, that its purport may not be quite understood—that even the mayor may get a wrong impression concerning it. The resolution did not declare that no member of the Society would accept an office that was properly pressed upon him; but that we would not annoy or embarrass the mayor by signing petitions or writing letters advocating the claims of other people. President Low is right in assuming that the Ohio man does not stuff cotton in his ears so that he may not hear his country’s call, and Mayor Strong will do well to bear this in mind. What we of the Ohio Society most desire is to have a valid excuse for refusing to advocate the claims of the ordinary office-seeker. And now I will read the letter:

“133 East Thirty-fifth Street,
“New York, December 4, 1894.

“S. S. PACKARD, Esq., 101 East Twenty-third Street, City.

“My Dear Sir: Only circumstances that are beyond my control could have prevented my acceptance of your invitation to the banquet to be given this evening in honor of the mayor-elect.

“The days through which we are passing are full of pleasant realization and of large hopes. In pursuance of a special purpose I have been devoting considerable of my time during the two weeks past to studying the history of the warfare which our citizens have been waging, and which culminated just four weeks ago in the election of Colonel Strong as mayor, and there has been steadily growing within me the clearer appreciation of what that glorious victory means. That which has been gained wins significance and lustre from the very coarseness and repulsiveness of that from which we have been delivered. It seems almost too good to be true. Long lines of meaning run out from that victory in every direction.

“First and foremost, we have not elected a compromise, but we have elected a man. We believe in Mr. Strong and we trust him. Our fear had been that rival elements would not be able to be brought together except at the expense of putting forward as candidate for mayor some equivocal makeshift, almost too good to be condemned, and a good deal too dubious to be safe to tie to. The disheartenment and mortification of such a condition we have been spared. We have won a fusion mayor without any confusion of principle or sacrifice of self-respect, which is a splendid tribute to the tone of the citizens and the quality of the candidate.

“I am also confident for the future, because I believe that the forthcoming mayor will enter upon the discharge of his high duties unmortgaged. He is nobody’s man because he is everybody’s man. He was elected to be the servant of the city, and the platform he was elected on is the platform he will administer on. He will not be unsusceptible to influence, of course, but nobody will own him. The official whom anybody owns is the official that all patriotic and self-respecting citizens ought to be quick to disown.

“I want, therefore, personally, to pledge to Mayor Strong my loyalty; we would like to be of service to him, but shall seek first of all to serve him by taking pains not to get in his way. There seems to be no necessary obstacle in the way of our having here in New York three years of quiet, honest, and harmonious city government that shall be productive of industries and educative of the higher temper and instincts of our citizenship, thereby laying the foundation of municipal prosperity and dignity upon which we may expect an enlightened and contented city to go on building in administrations to come.

“Yours very sincerely,

“C. H. PARKHURST.”

President Burnett: “In many feasts the best course is left until the last. We have fashioned our banquet a little on that plan. Among all the agencies and forces leading to our victory, there is none that is entitled to more credit for wisdom of action, for thoughtful planning, than the Committee of Seventy. That committee selected Colonel Strong as the standard-bearer in the fight against corruption and to oust Tammany. Its work was efficient. It has made from the beginning no mistakes. When it selected Colonel Strong to lead in the fight it followed that up by giving to him its active support, and by its voice and work did grand service in the great struggle. Its work is not yet done. It has been alluded to by Mr. McKelway and by other speakers. You have heard from Brother Packard, and it is true, that Colonel Strong, as the law now stands, has the appointment, out of the innumerable offices of this city, of but ten places. The offices are now filled with the servants, the agents of that vile body we have tried to destroy. They represent this system of governing a city by terror and by spoils. That system must be rooted out from the bottom—its very roots dug out and burned up; and until you have accomplished that you have not regenerated New York. Until you have taken from every office its Tammany head and Tammany sinecures now fattening on that office, you have not destroyed the system; and until you plough it up, dig it up, and cast it onto the offal heap, the garbage of this city, and dump it into the sea, or take the new methods now of destroying offal, by cremating it, you have not ended Tammany. [Applause.]

“You remember the story of the old darkey and his pickaninny who were sitting on the pier fishing, and the little nigger fell into the sea. The old darkey promptly jumped in and rescued him, and after he had brought him to land the policeman congratulated him upon his courage and heroism. The old darkey replied: ‘Oh, da’s all right; had to sabe dat nigger; dat boy got all de bait!’ [Laughter.] Now the effort of Tammany will be to preserve their big and little niggers, because they have got the bait, and without bait as a reward for votes, and without a corrupt police to terrorize and tyrannize over the people, Tammany would be powerless in your city.

“In the work of reforming the law so as to give Colonel Strong the power of appointment, making these places vacant, and (like Sheridan in the great Union Army) bring his eyes and his hands to seek out and grapple with the enemy, to find the places where they lurk and are entrenched, that Committee of Seventy can do a great work, and to its efficient and clear-headed and clear-sighted head, Mr. Larocque, we appeal to form and help carry through such remedial legislation and to go forward with such departmental investigations and reformations as shall remedy the ills under which we suffer. I present Mr. Larocque.” [Applause.]

Mr. Larocque said: “Mr. President, Colonel Strong, and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society:

“It gives me great pleasure to be with you to-night to join with you in the tribute of respect to the guest of the evening, and to rejoice with you in the change which has come over the condition of our city. The morning of the 6th of November found the city of New York bound hand and foot—every office in the hands of the adherents of a political organization that had fastened upon its vitals and controlled every motion of its system. Abuses had grown to such an extent that when the city of New York was mentioned in the presence of one of its citizens, he involuntarily hung his head with shame, and so great and so widespread had become this power that the courage to resist seemed to have departed from our people. The evening of the 6th of November saw this condition, if not reversed, in the way of reversal, and to-day, for the first time in years, the citizen of New York, whether born in Ohio or in the state itself, can, as I say, raise his head when the city is spoken of, look frankly into the face of his interlocutor, and say: 'Yes, I am a citizen of New York, and the citizens of the city of New York, as shown by this vote at the polls of the majority of its people, have arisen to a sense of their opportunities, and have overthrown by their votes the power that has so long disgraced them.' "

The speaker followed with an extended and eloquent elaboration of the thought outlined in the above.

President Burnett: "Fellow-members of the Ohio Society, I am under a promise not to call Governor McKinley to make a speech. [Cries for McKinley.] I was about to add that, although I am under that pledge, I am your servant. [Laughter.] Your orders I will obey. Wherever Ohio boys are gathered together, and Mr. McKinley, Governor McKinley, of Ohio, is in their presence, they would not go home and sleep well could they not hear his voice." [Cries of "Good!"]

Governor McKinley said: "Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society:

"I have no purpose to interfere with the programme of the evening, or with the order of speaking as it has been arranged by the president of the Society. I counted myself fortunate to be in the city on this occasion when my kinsmen from the state of Ohio, represented in this association, were assembled to do honor to their old president and to the mayor-elect of the city of New York. I come to join with them my tribute of respect to one whom I have known long, have long honored and esteemed as one of my old and time-honored and much-beloved friends. You have selected him as the mayor of this great city, not because he is from the state of Ohio; you have selected him for what he is, for what he represents, for what he stands for. He represents in a long business life honest, clean, manly methods, and I am quite sure to the administration of the great office to which he has so recently been chosen he will bring the same clean, business, manly methods that have characterized every business connection of his life. [Applause.] I want to assure my associates of the Ohio Society that Ohio is justly proud of the distinction which has been given to one of her early citizens, Colonel Strong. And I wish for him, as every Ohioan does, no matter what his political associations may be, a successful administration of the municipal government of the greatest city of the greatest state and the greatest nation under the sun." [Applause.]

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

President Burnett: "Fellow-members of the Ohio Society, these thoughtful words of thoughtful men should sink deep into your hearts.

"There is one great force and factor in the victory that has not been mentioned to-night. Emotion and sentiment, it is said, play always a very important part in every great revolution. In that part of our revolution there was an element that has not been brought to your attention—the ladies of New York. [Applause.] When they threw themselves on the side of truth and purity, the chivalry of native-born Americans was aroused, and they poised their lances for the fray. I propose the toast of the evening, 'The Ladies of New York.' To the Ladies, God bless them. And God bless all of you, and good-night."

David Homer Bates was re-elected chairman of the governing committee in December. At the meeting of December 10, 1894, President Burnett reported the appointment of the following committees: Literature and art, Homer Lee, chairman; J. F. Holloway, L. C. Hopkins, Franklin Tuttle, J. Q. A. Ward. Entertainment, Warren Higley, chairman; Thomas Ewing, Jr., Andrew J. C. Foyé, Curtis G. Harraman, Homer Lee. Library, David H. Bates, chairman; W. S. Hawk, C. C. Shayne. Auditing, Frank C. Loveland, chairman; W. C. Andrews, John D. Archbold, P. B. Armstrong, Theo. S. Nye; Membership, L. C. Hopkins, chairman; John D. Archbold, Geo. E. Armstrong, Jas. M. Ashley, Jr., S. D. Brewster, Henry A. Glassford, Wm. S. Hawk, John Q. Mitchell, Edgar A. Follett, Andrew J. C. Foyé, David F. Harbaugh, Chas. B. Peet, C. C. Shayne, Wm. L. Brown, De Frees Critten, E. S. Wallace, Wm. H. Eckert, Fulton McMahan, Otis Wilkinson, Peter Zucker.

The president followed this announcement with a few practical remarks suggesting a plan of campaign in securing new members. He broached the question of a ladies' reception to be given by the Society during the season, suggesting that a combination of dinner, entertainment and dance might cause it to be a novel and notable affair.

The members dined together at Morelli's on January 14, 1895. Mr. Crall, the treasurer, reported that the balance of the banquet finances amounted to $404, part of which would be expended in the issuing of a year book of the Society containing its constitution, by-laws, roster, etc., as well as the proceedings and addresses of the banquet in honor of Mayor-elect William L. Strong. The preparation of this book had been placed in the hands of S. S. Packard, chairman of the banquet committee. The meeting of March 11th was held at the same place. At the end of the courses President Burnett introduced, in a few happy remarks, William L. Strong, his predecessor, to the assembly. Colonel Strong reported as a committee of one upon the "pleasures and pains of city government."

No doubt the fact that the banquet in the December preceding, in honor of Mayor Strong, was so large and so important an affair, had much to do with the omission of the usual festal event in 1895 and the substitution of a ladies' reception and dinner in its stead.

This was given on Tuesday evening, April 30th, at Delmonico's. The following gentlemen had the arrangements in charge: Warren Higley, chairman; Andrew J. C. Foyé, C. C. Shayne, L. C. Hopkins, Leander H. Crall, Homer Lee, Curtis G. Harraman, Thomas Ewing, Jr.

The fact that this form of an entertainment was an innovation, in that ladies were included, and the further fact that the time of giving it was very late in the season, caused some anxiety and spurred the committee to unusual activity in their preparations. But the ladies responded generously to the invitation of the committee to assist in the work, and the following kindly consented to serve on the reception committee, viz.: Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. William L. Strong, Mrs. Thomas Ewing, Mrs. Milton I. Southard, Mrs. L. H. Crall, Mrs. A. J. C. Foyé, Mrs. Warren Higley, Mrs. W. C. Andrews, Mrs. S. S. Packard, Mrs. Homer Lee, Mrs. David H. Bates, Mrs. Murat Halstead, Mrs. C. C. Shayne, Mrs. Geo. E. Armstrong, Mrs. L. C. Weir, Mrs. Thomas Ewing, Jr., and Mrs. Allison R. Hopkins.

The dining room was arranged with small tables, at each of which one of the above named committee of ladies presided, and the guests were so arranged as to bring relatives and friends together at the same table. This made the banquet a very delightful and charming occasion. After dinner the large hall was cleared and the dance commenced, and this was enjoyed by all. The committee in reporting the event to the society made use of the following commendatory language: "We are pleased to report that this reception and banquet was a great success; that it was pronounced by those in attendance as a very joyful and happy occasion, and the committee are of the opinion that the Society will do well to consider the giving of a similar banquet annually hereafter."

At the May meeting President Burnett read a letter from Senator Calvin S. Brice, giving an account of a plan proposed for the preservation, in the hands of his daughter Katharine, of the estate of the late Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase. A committee consisting of A. D. Juilliard, chairman; Wager Swayne, Thomas T. Eckert and Calvin S. Brice were appointed to co-operate with the president in the presentation of the plan to the members of the Society and the solicitation of individual subscriptions. A letter was also read from Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, appealing to the sons of Ohio and of New York to contribute to the preservation and care of the house of Gen. Rufus Putnam in Rutland, Mass., where the scheme of the Ohio Company was evolved. The matter was referred to a committee to be appointed by the chair. In the June meeting it was ordered that the rooms of the Society be opened to the families of members and ladies introduced by them, from 10 A. M. to 7 P. M.

The following nominating committees were chosen at the meeting of October 14, 1895: Franklin Tuttle, F. H. Kingsbury, Dr. S. J. Converse, W. H. Eckert, E. A. Follett, J. F. Holloway, David H. Bates, Jr. The meeting of November 11th took the form of a dinner at Morelli's, and the main business transacted was the presentation of the following ticket: President, Henry L. Burnett; vice-presidents, S. S. Packard, Milton I. Southard, Andrew J. C. Foyé, George E. Armstrong, A. D. Juilliard; secretary, Evarts L. Prentiss; recording secretary, Noah H. Swayne 2d; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, to serve for three years, Henry B. Wilson, Warren Higley, T. H. Wheeler.

After the regular business had been transacted, the president, after some happy remarks, called upon a guest of the Society, Mr. Haskell, of Ohio, who responded with the praise of the Buckeye state, especially that portion known as the "Black Swamp." Mr. McMillan, the newly appointed park commissioner, gave reminiscences of his early life in the Mahoning valley. The description of this region was supplemented by W. C. Andrews' account of the iron industries. Messrs. Southard, Packard and Chance made running remarks appropriate of the reminiscences suggested by previous speakers, Mr. Chance ending with an eloquent eulogy of the "Old Roman," Senator Allen G. Thurman, prostrated by illness. In accordance with this feeling Judge John M. Guiteau presented the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Ohio Society tenders its sympathy to Mrs. Thurman and his relatives during the illness of the 'Old Roman.'" The motion was carried.

At the annual meeting held on November 29th the gentlemen above named were elected. It was ordered that the banquet be held on January 11, 1896.

David Homer Bates, chairman of the governing committee, reported upon a number of matters, and, continuing, said: "The treasurer is the only officer of the Society who can furnish data concerning resignations. In fact, the unwritten law which governs that subject is just the reverse of that which applied in the case of the Irishman's wife who had died. The question was put to him, 'Was she resigned?' 'Bedad,' says Pat, 'she had to be!' Brother Crall, however, considers that as long as there's life there's hope of getting him to pay his dues, and thus it is we seldom or ever hear of a resigned Ohio man. The particular attention of the members of the Society is called to the fact that our membership is not increasing as rapidly as should be the case, to compensate for inevitable losses. Let each one of those present to-night resolve that he will bring in at least one new member before the annual banquet, or say before February 1, 1896. This would insure real growth. Some of us have sons, brothers or other relations or near acquaintances, who would probably join our ranks for the asking. During the year we held two general meetings, first the banquet to Mayor-elect Strong on December 4, 1894, and the ladies' reception on April 30, 1895. Both were eminently successful, as those who had the pleasure of attending can testify, and we are now eagerly craning our necks to see when our next banquet will occur and what will be its peculiar character. We can, however, depend on the committee having that matter in charge giving us something that we shall all be proud of, particularly in view of the fresh high record made by Ohio in the person of our worthy past president, Mayor Strong, in his most excellent speech at the Atlanta Exposition."

The report of the secretary was as follows:

"It seems proper that the Society should require each active officer to annually render an account of his stewardship and of the various talents intrusted by it to his care.

"The duties assigned to the secretary by the by-laws are of five sorts. In the first place, he is to conduct the correspondence of the Society. During the past year such correspondence has been very limited in volume and has consisted chiefly of answers to inquiries by members, of the announcements of changes of residence or of the resignation or death of members. The matters contained in these communications which seemed to be of common concern have been from time to time laid before the Society. The notices of all meetings, required by the by-laws to be issued by the secretary, have been so issued and mailed to all the members at the addresses supplied by them. The roll of members has likewise been kept and that has been an easier clerical task than the secretary would wish it to be, for the roll, while of goodly proportions, is not so long as it ought to be. With all the changes it undergoes by resignation, death or by accession, it continues constantly near the 300 mark, the total present membership being 332, divided into: resident, 257; non-resident, 71; honorary, 4. In looking over that roll, from time to time, the secretary cannot but be more and more sensibly impressed with satisfaction that so honorable a duty has been his, and he can but wonder whether any other society in this city can boast a roster so brilliant or one upon which the names stand for so much in all that constitutes success.

"The most comprehensive duty required of the secretary under our by-laws is the one which provides that he shall 'furnish information on call of any of the committees and discharge such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Society or the president.' While the secretary has been at all times ready and willing to furnish on call such information as his limited capacity would supply, he is gratified to report that the call upon him during the past year has been fittingly moderated to the supply. He may also report that the other duties assigned to him by the Society and the president have been assigned with signal forbearance, but such duties as have been so assigned he has endeavored to perform.

“ Respectfully submitted.

“ EVARTS L. PRENTISS, Secretary.”

On December 8th the president appointed the following committees for the ensuing year: Art and literature, Homer Lee, J. Q. A. Ward, Daniel C. Beard, J. Stedman Converse, Franklin Tuttle. Entertainment, S. S. Packard, S. R. Beckwith, D. H. Bates, Jr., Samuel McMillan, C. G. Harraman. Auditing, L. C. Hopkins, H. A. Glassford, C. W. Moore, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Warner Ells. Library, C. C. Shayne, Thos. S. Nye, Mahlon Chance, H. F. Waltman. Membership, Edward S. Wallace, H. H. Brockway, Theo. Ricksecker, J. Q. Mitchell, R. J. Chard, T. C. Campbell, Daniel Pritchard, C. C. Shayne, Frank C. Loveland, Nathan Guilford, Quinton Corwine, Henry De Mult, Otis Wilkinson, John F. Rodamor. Banquet, W. L. Strong, Wager Swayne, L. H. Crall, A. G. McCook, Wm. L. Brown, F. H. Kingsbury, Wm. S. Hawk, John D. Archbold, Mahlon Chance, Homer Lee, Thomas Ewing, Samuel Thomas, J. J. McCook, Calvin S. Brice, Warren Higley, Milton I. Southard, S. S. Packard, A. J. C. Foyé, George Milmine, E. B. Thomas.

On December 7, 1895, D. H. Bates was re-elected chairman of the governing committee, and Messrs. Foyé, Follett and Peet were again chosen members of the house committee. The first gathering of 1896 was at the Windsor hotel, on January 13th, a dinner being served and a number of ladies being present. Speeches were made by President Burnett, Mayor Strong, General Swayne, Mr. Packard and others.

A sad and memorable gathering was the special meeting called for January 22, 1896, to take action upon the death of Gen. Thomas Ewing, the first president of the Society, one of its most energetic friends and supporters in the formative period; a man who had won fame as a soldier in the Civil War and as a statesman in civic affairs. A sad accident had cut him off in his days of greatest usefulness; and while the Society mourned the loss of its first president, each individual member felt that he had lost a personal friend.

President Burnett called the meeting to order and in a few heartfelt and eloquent words referred to the loss that had befallen them. A. J. C. Foyé moved that a committee be appointed to draft suitable resolutions and report to the meeting before adjournment. The following gentlemen were named as that committee: Wager Swayne, chairman; William L. Strong, Milton I. Southard, S. S. Packard and Andrew J. C. Foyé. The committee retired, and after a time returned with a series of resolutions that were unanimously adopted. It was also resolved that the members of the Society attend the funeral as a body. Eulogistic speeches were made by Colonel Strong, Dr. Beckwith, General Swayne and others. The resolutions follow:

IT WAS

RESOLVED, THAT THE ACCIDENT WHICH HAS RE-SULTED IN THE DEATH OF

HON. THOMAS EWING

HAS CLOSED SUDDENLY A LIFE OF USEFULNESS AND HONOR, TO THE DEEP REGRET OF A HOST OF FRIENDS, TO THIS SOCIETY'S DETRIMENT AND SORROW, AND TO HIS FAMILY'S IRREPARABLE LOSS.

The life thus closed is third of an illustrious series. His Grandfather Lieutenant George Ewing, was an officer in the Continental Army, - so many of whose officers before its dissolution, had already associated themselves to found west of the Ohio, a new State which should forever be one of the United States, and is that State whose history and Association this Society was organized to cherish.

Preceding them in that march of the westward course of empire, before their journey of transcendent consequences, in 1788 he had already established in the western limits of Virginia, his own home, where his son

Thomas Ewing,
the father of our friend,
was born.

This gentleman, who in his infancy was taken to a new home which his father possessed to make in the new State, became and so continued while he lived.

*The deceased in his turn, interesting much of these things that were

The modest but invaluable part he bore in securing for Kansas of his country, will never be forgotten by those of us who remember the narration to which once, in these rooms, he was constrained by our insistence.

CHAPTER XII

1896—1897

THE tenth annual banquet* of the Ohio Society was given at Delmonico's on the evening of February 8, 1896. It was in charge of the gentlemen who have been already named as a committee for this occasion. At the centre of the speaker's table, just beneath the shield of Ohio, draped with the flag of the Union, sat Gen. Henry L. Burnett, the president of the Society. Bishop Henry C. Potter sat at his right, while Gov. Asa S. Bushnell, of Ohio, occupied the seat at his left. Four members of the governor's staff, Adjutant-General H. H. Axline, Col. Henry H. Prettyman, Col. C. B. Wing and Col. C. E. Burke, occupied seats at the head table, together with Joseph H. Choate, Judge A. C. Coxe, J. M. Richardson, ex-Secretary of the Treasury Charles Foster, Robert E. McKisson, mayor of Cleveland; P. Tecumseh Sherman, Gen. Wager Swayne, Wilson M. Day and Hon. James H. Hoyt.

At six long tables sat more than two hundred members of the Society, presided over by G. E. Armstrong and Mahlon Chance at table A; A. J. C. Foyé and Col. W. L. Brown at table B; A. D. Juilliard and L. H. Crall at table C; Mayor Strong and Homer Lee at table D; S. S. Packard and E. B. Thomas at table E; and Hon. Milton I. Southard and Geo. W. Perkins at table F.

Letters of regret were received from a number of prominent persons. Ex-President Harrison wrote:

"Hon. W. L. Strong, New York City.

"My Dear Mr. Mayor: I have your invitation to attend the annual banquet of the Ohio Society of the State of New York and to make an address. I regret to say that it will not be possible to accept this kind invitation. Sincerely yours,

"BENJAMIN HARRISON."

From ex-Gov. William McKinley came the following telegram:

"Hon. W. L. Strong, New York city.

"My Dear Mr. Mayor: I would be delighted to be with the members of the Ohio Society on the evening of the 8th inst., but it is impossible for me to do so. I beg that you extend my grateful acknowledgments to the officers of the Society for their invitation, and I trust that the anniversary will be the most successful in the history of the Society. Very sincerely,

“WILLIAM MCKINLEY.”

Ex-Gov. J. B. Foraker expressed his regrets thus:

“Hon. W. L. Strong, New York city.

“My Dear Sir: My other engagements are so numerous and so exacting that I find it impossible for me to go to New York on the 8th inst., and for that reason I regretfully conclude that I must forego the pleasure of meeting with the Ohio Society until some future occasion. Sincerely wishing you a successful and enjoyable time, I remain, very truly yours, etc.,

“J. B. FORAKER.”

United States Senator William B. Allison, of Iowa, wrote as follows:

“Washington, D. C., Feb. 7, 1896.

“Thanks for your friendly letter. I wish I could meet and greet you and other friends at the banquet to-morrow night. An important engagement makes it impossible for me to have the pleasure.

W. B. ALLISON.”

Letters of congratulations were also received from ex-Gov. James E. Campbell, Attorney-General Judson Harmon, United States Senator George F. Hoar, George C. Tichenor, and others.

Each member of the banquet committee wore the colors of the buckeye. Each member of the city government present received a present of a fancy napkin inscribed with some appropriate sentiment. The author of these “poems” was unduly modest and insisted upon remaining anonymous. One of the ditties referred to Theodore Roosevelt, police commissioner, and the first four lines of it ran thus:

“Hist! Hist! Hist! Here is the bogy man,
Be careful how you drink with him; he'll catch you if he can.
His smile is frank and open as the side doors used to be;
He wears plain clothes on duty—he's on it now, you see.”

All the sentiments were in the same playful vein, evidently intended to help “digestion wait on appetite.”

The president, in rising to offer the usual words of welcome to the members and guests, was received with applause. Regarding the Ohio Society of New York, the president was glad to tell them, he said, that the association financially and in members was sound and strong. Whether or not General Burnett in thus emphasizing the state of the society as strong meant any allusion to the mayor was not apparent, but whatever his intention, the members of the Society alighted on the word instantly, and finding a reference in it to Mayor Strong, rose in a body and chorused three cheers for the mayor, which the latter was forced to acknowledge. Proceeding, General Burnett said that every man of Ohio was imbued deeply with love of his state and love of his nation, and filled with honest fellowship of man to man. He believed that the Society and its sentiments would continue to grow. Continuing, he said:

“This banquet of to-night, held on the 8th day of February, is the seventy-sixth anniversary of the day of the birth of one of Ohio’s greatest sons, General Sherman, and it is only right that we, the children of Ohio, should do honor to him because no American has done greater service for his country than General Sherman. Of all the great heroes of the civil war he was second to none in strategic ability, in fighting qualities and in victorious achievement. (Renewed applause.) In individual character of life he was pure and noble, and as was said of an exalted one of the older time, he was of ‘passing stout courage and of invincible fortitude.’”

General Burnett then proposed the toast of General Sherman, which was drunk by all present standing and in respectful silence.

Governor Bushnell, who was introduced with graceful words by the president, spoke next. After the applause, which had greeted the mention of his name, had subsided, he opened with a sly allusion to the necessity of curtailing his remarks, because of the strictness with which the 12 o’clock closing rule was enforced, and then proceeded to instance the phenomenal growth of the state of Ohio in ninety-three years, from a small colony of only forty-eight people to a vast, populated state of no fewer than four millions of people. Its influence, and its people, as well, were, moreover, not confined to the state of Ohio, as was evidenced by the fact that in almost every large city of the Union were to be found enough sons of the state to form a substantial and numerically large Ohio Society. Speaking of the achievements of his state, Governor Bushnell said that when a call was made for soldiers to defend the honor of the flag, Ohio gave to the service of the country 310,000 men, and although New York, in proportion to population, gave as large a contribution, he trusted his hearers would agree with him when he maintained that the loyalty of Ohio gained the admiration of the whole people of the United States. It is needless to state that this contention was received with unbounded enthusiasm, which burst forth again and again as Ohio’s governor, in enumerating the celebrated soldiers and statesmen of Ohio birth, mentioned the names of Hayes, Garfield, Waite, Grant, Sherman and Sheridan.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Nor was the volume of enthusiasm diminished when the governor came by easy stages to describe the qualities of the living lights of his state. In rapid sequence he cited name after name of well-known public men from Ohio, and came eventually to the name of McKinley. For a few moments following the sons of Ohio, not content with giving full vent to lung power, jumped on their chairs, waved their handkerchiefs, and in many other ways vented their feelings, until a climax was reached by Col. Charles B. Wing, of the governor's staff, who sat at the end of the platform, precipitating himself and his chair from the raised dais to the floor of the dining-hall, two or three feet below. Many friends rushed to the assistance of the embarrassed colonel, whose enthusiasm succumbed to the force of gravity, and in the general laughter that ensued the McKinley cheers were allowed to die away. The governor had little to add to the words which led up to so great an exuberance of the feelings of the sons of Ohio, but he continued long enough to pay an earnest rebuke to the man in the senate who recently spoke in such disrespectful terms of the highest officers in the nation. "If such a man," he said, "has no respect for the chief magistrate, let him at least have some respect for the highest office of the land."

In terms of high tribute the president next introduced Hon. Joseph H. Choate. The cordial reception which was accorded to Mr. Choate was fully as unanimous as in the case of the previous speakers. At the outset he hastened to inform the Society that he was not familiar with the sons of Ohio, and he felt himself obliged to confess that there was only one of this band whose course he had watched with anything approaching earnest solicitude and anxious prayer. It was unnecessary for Mr. Choate to tell his hearers that Mayor Strong was the object of his remark. The laughter of the members forestalled him. "I never understood," said Mr. Choate, "how in the face of adverse circumstances our mayor always sustained undoubted courage. No matter what happens nothing can disturb his serenity. And no matter how his chosen servants may fail to achieve success and triumph in the popular mind, Mayor Strong continues unmoved. But when I look at the motto upon this menu, which is signed by George Washington, and also, I notice, Mayor Strong, I am shown why he always keeps up such an undoubted courage. The motto says, 'If we are overpowered we will retire to the fold of Ohio, and there we will be free.' So, gentlemen, we see by the direct application of the motto the reason for his display of such continuous courage."

This sally was received with unbounded laughter, in which the mayor himself joined. Leaving the facetious strain, Mr. Choate proceeded to speak of the advance of Ohio in the last few years, and said it could no longer be looked upon as a Western state, but must be identified with New York and

New England. In the near future, he said, the great Eastern states would not be able to command the influence they had hitherto exerted by force of numbers. Whatever influence it would be left to their province to put forward, he premised, would be that of force of character alone. From this sentiment Mr. Choate went on to draw deductions from the lives of Sherman and Grant, and, speaking of the direction in which the personal feelings of these two men tended, he said they were ever advocates of peace. He closed as follows:

“They sleep in their last resting places, one on the banks of the Hudson and the other on the banks of the Mississippi, and knowing, as I am persuaded they do, that, as they look down upon us to-day, there is nothing that could excite more opposition or more condemnation on their part than the attempt of any party or of any men to excite an unjust and unnecessary quarrel with our sister-nation of England.”

Mayor Strong, James H. Hoyt and other guests also spoke.

At a meeting held at about this time Hon. Asa L. Bushnell, governor of Ohio, was elected an honorary member, and acknowledged the honor in the following words:

“OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, COLUMBUS, O., May 29, 1896.

“Noah H. Swayne, Recording Secretary, Ohio Society of New York.

“My Dear Mr. Swayne: It gives me the greatest pleasure to acknowledge receipt of your valued communication of May 27th, informing me that at the last meeting of the governing committee of the Ohio Society of New York I was accorded the distinguished honor of being elected an honorary member of the Society.

“You are probably aware of how greatly I appreciate the action of the committee. The Ohio Society of New York has always commanded my entire admiration and respect, and since the meeting in February, at which I had the privilege of being a guest, it has enlisted my love. I shall never forget the pleasant greeting then accorded me, and I can assure you that the renewed honor you have paid me will always be most highly esteemed. Will you please advise me whether there are any formalities with which I have to comply? It will give me sincere pleasure to qualify in any way that you may suggest, and I beg that you will notify me, so that I will not appear unmindful of my duty. Hoping that you are very well and asking you to convey my respects to your associates of the Society, I am

“Very cordially yours,

“ASA S. BUSHNELL.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The following gentlemen were named, on October 12th, as a committee to present nominations for officers for the ensuing year: W. H. Eckert, Ralph W. Carroll, George B. Hibbard, R. J. Chard, D. H. Bates, Franklin Tuttle and Charles W. Morris. This committee, at the informal meeting held at Morelli's on November 9th, reported through Mr. Chard the following nominations: President, Henry L. Burnett; vice-presidents, S. S. Packard, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Milton I. Southard, George E. Armstrong, A. D. Juilliard; secretary, Evarts L. Prentiss; recording secretary, Noah H. Swayne, 2d; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, F. H. Kingsbury, Colgate Hoyt, Anson G. McCook.

Henry B. Wilson announced a gift from the Hon. Whitelaw Reid of handsomely bound volumes of the donor's interesting work, "Ohio in the War." Resolutions of thanks were adopted as follows:

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. Whitelaw Reid with the compliments of the Ohio Society, and its best wishes for the long continuance of a life uniformly devoted to the best interests of our common country, so illustriously exemplified in the fields of journalism and national diplomacy."

General Wager Swayne announced that he would speak at length to the Society in regard to several matters. He voiced the affection of the members of the Society for Mr. Crall, its treasurer, and their sympathy toward him in his recent affliction, and, at the speaker's suggestion, silent expression of that sympathy was given by those present rising in their places.

General Swayne paid appropriate tribute to the memory of the late ex-Governor James M. Ashley, calling especial attention to his labors in the passage of the constitutional amendment, which forever excluded slavery from the United States, and to the very able address by the governor before the Society upon the history of that amendment. At the conclusion of General Swayne's address a series of resolutions in honor of the memory of Governor Ashley were adopted.

General Swayne, continuing, spoke of the recent honor that the Ohio Society had received in the election of Major William McKinley to the presidency, and proposed the following resolution as expressing the unpartisan sentiments of an unpartisan Society. It was received with emphatic applause, and seconded with generous approval by Mr. Foyé:

"The Ohio Society of New York, existing for the purpose of maintaining kindly memories of its members, individual relations to the state, and cherishing a fellowship inspired by those relations, enjoys the fact that once more the state has contributed to the well-being of the country in the person of William McKinley, a citizen to whose past career and present attitude the people of the United States have given their own majestic verdict of approval.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

As an expression of this feeling, the Society extends to the president-elect its sincere and respectful congratulations, earnestly wishing him great success in commanding the respect and admiration of the country in the discharge of the great trust to which he has been called.

“Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the president-elect.”

While the question was before the Society, General Swayne took occasion to define the present political situation in the United States. He characterized the socialistic features developed in the recent campaign as one phase of an important movement in society all over the world, having for its ultimate end a contraction of individual liberty, and the establishment of a form of government in which the powers now in the beneficiaries of government, that is, the people, were to be turned over to the trustees, that is, the sovereign. In closing, he pointed out as the true remedy for such conditions the improvement of the trustee. He suggested that in the Ohio Society existed a nucleus for effective action in the application of such remedy, and maintained that it behooves us to exercise our powers to that end.

The president called attention to the necessity for prompt action in relation to the next annual banquet, and urged that definite plans be made at the next meeting, November 30th. Professor Roberts gave two recitations for the entertainment of those present. Mahlon Chance, C. C. Shayne and President Burnett recalled some interesting experiences and anecdotes of the recent political campaign.

The annual meeting was held at the rooms of the Society on November 30th, 1896, the president in the chair. Mr. Bates, as chairman of the governing committee, reported that monthly meetings had been held throughout the year, with the exception of the summer months; that the attendance at the meetings had been regular, and that the members had acted throughout the year in perfect harmony and accord. Mr. Bates also called attention to the fact that the number of deaths of members during the past year had been eighteen, as against forty-two for the previous nine years of the Society's existence, which was a very marked increase in the death rate. He read the list of those who had died, and called attention to the fact that there were among the number United States senators, congressmen and state governors. He stated that as an offset to the large number of deaths the Society had been increased by the election of thirty-eight new members during the year. Mr. Prentiss, the secretary, reported as follows:

“It is one of the duties of the office with which the Society has honored me to keep the roll of its membership. That roll must be returned at the end of this year, bearing the erasure of many names. Some of them, names which have been identified with the foundation and success of our Society; some of them, names which will remain always impressed upon the history of our native state, as well as upon the history of our country. Scarcely a meeting has been held since the new year at which the death of one or more of our members has not been announced. The records of the Society, while they bear tribute, in graceful phrases, to our formal appreciation of their friendship and worth, must also emphasize in our hearts the regret that more of our words of praise had not been said to our friends while they were living rather than in their memory.

“Our Society has been characterized as an organization having for its purpose the praising of Ohio men and their deeds. If that is true, I believe we make no mistake. The fulfillment of such a purpose may make Ohio men more happy, it cannot make them less worthy or less loyal.

“The report of the chairman of the governing committee presents one view of our membership roll which is most hopeful. The fact that thirty-eight new names have been proposed for enrollment and that twenty-five different members appear responsible for their proposal speaks well for the efforts of those members and for the future of the Society. These additions to our membership suggest, too, the inquiry whether we do not owe it to those who are coming in with us, as well as to those who have long been members, that we make more vigorous efforts toward fulfilling the first object of the Society as stated in its constitution, ‘the cultivation of social intercourse among its members.’

“The Society not being conducted as a club, its benefits and advantages are comprised for the most part in its meetings and social functions. It is true that we can, and do, maintain most friendly and cordial good feeling when we assemble merely for the purposes of business, but a considerable number of our members will not attend a simple business meeting. In order, then, to cultivate social intercourse effectively and generally, I believe we ought to come together more frequently for that purpose. The surplus in our treasury shows the result of skilful and prudent management. It also indicates that we might perhaps, safely and wisely, expend a larger sum each year in promoting the objects of the Society, and for the benefit and pleasure of those who maintain it. I believe that if we had more frequent gatherings of a social nature, we would add attractions to membership and unity and strength to the Society.

“Respectfully submitted,

“EVARTS L. PRENTISS, Secretary.”

The treasurer, L. H. Crall, rendered his annual report, showing the balance in the treasury. C. C. Shayne, chairman of the library committee, reported the addition of forty volumes during the year. He mentioned as contributions of special importance certain books from Senator Harper, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio; "Men of Columbus and Familiar Faces of Ohio," from Governor Asa L. Bushnell; twelve volumes of the work of Thomas Hardy, from the publisher, Peter F. Collier; "Ohio in the War," from the author, Hon. White-law Reid, and several volumes on various subjects from Dr. E. B. Foote.

Under the head of miscellaneous business, General Swayne called particular attention to that part of the report of the secretary which recommended more earnest cultivation of social intercourse among its members, and moved that $25, in addition to the usual sum, be placed at the disposal of the entertainment committee for use at future meetings of the Society. Carried.

The election of officers being next in order, General Burnett called upon General Swayne to take the chair. In taking the chair, General Swayne remarked that General Burnett's unwillingness to preside over an election in which he was a candidate was another of the frequent instances of "the inordinate modesty of the Ohio man." C. C. Shayne moved that the recording secretary cast the ballot of the Society for the candidates presented by the nominating committee. Carried. The secretary reported the unanimous election of the gentlemen who had been named. The chairman said that the scarcity of candidates must be regarded as still another instance of the modesty of the Ohio man. General Burnett was recalled to the chair. He called upon the mayor for a report as to the condition of the city of New York.

Colonel Strong reported that since the Ohio Society had assumed the government of the city the laws on the statute books had been rigidly enforced; that the streets had been kept thoroughly clean, and that the city was in a better sanitary condition than ever before; that during the life of the Society the death rate had been reduced one-half, and that since the election of an Ohio man to the presidency of the United States, the death rate of this city had been reduced to the lowest figure in its history. The mayor reported further that during the life of the Ohio Society the number of arrests had been reduced forty-six per cent., and that the decorum of the city had materially improved during the last year. He stated that although there had been a nominal increase of drinking places under the Raines law, nevertheless, it was one of the best laws ever passed, although it needed certain amendments. He expressed his firm conviction that all of the city departments were doing their best to get one hundred cents in value for the city for every dollar expended. He closed by expressing his intention to be present at every meeting of the Society which it was possible for him to attend. The president stated that he felt it his duty to say to the mayor that the people of the city of New York felt for the first time that they had a clean, honest and efficient government. He congratulated the city and country in having Ohio men as chief magistrates.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

When the new governing committee convened, Lowell M. Palmer was elected chairman and Messrs. Foyé chairman and B. H. Wilson and Franklin Tuttle members of the house committee. Some days later Mr. Palmer notified the committee of his inability to serve as chairman, and Richard J. Chard was unanimously chosen in his stead. At the meeting of December 14th the president announced the following committees: Entertainment, Warren Higley, chairman; Colgate Hoyt, Mahlon Chance, Putnam Bradlee Strong, D. H. Bates, Jr.; library, Henry H. Vail, chairman; Rush Taggart, S. S. Packard, William Collett Carr, D. F. Harbaugh; art and literature, Homer Lee, chairman; J. Q. A. Ward, D. C. Beard, Franklin Tuttle, H. F. Waltman; auditing, H. A. Glassford, chairman; F. C. Loveland, Cary W. Moore, J. Q. Mitchell, E. A. Follett; banquet, Anson G. McCook, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, Calvin S. Brice, William L. Strong, Wager Swayne, Samuel Thomas, John D. Rockefeller, Murat Halstead, A. D. Juilliard, Colgate Hoyt, E. B. Thomas, Samuel McMillan, J. Q. A. Ward, Peter F. Collier, Milton I. Southard, Thomas Ewing, Jr., T. H. Wheeler, William L. Brown, Homer Lee, Andrew J. C. Foyé.

The president read a letter from President-elect McKinley in acknowledgment of the congratulatory resolutions passed by the members of the Society.

The Society was entertained, on January 11, 1897, with singing and recitations by Miss Clara A. Stutsman and Mrs. Harriet Webb. General Swayne and General Burnett spoke upon topics of general interest, and a collation was served.

The eleventh annual banquet was given at Delmonico's on Saturday evening, January 16, 1897. As there had been some changes in the committee responsible for the event from that announced above, the names of those who served in that capacity are here given: Anson G. McCook, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, William L. Strong, Wager Swayne, Calvin S. Brice, Samuel Thomas, S. S. Packard, Colgate Hoyt, Milton I. Southard, Peter F. Collier, T. H. Wheeler, William L. Brown, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Murat Halstead, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Homer Lee, secretary. The reception committee: Warren Higley, George P. Tangeman, W. H. Caldwell, Quinton Corwine, H. T. Ambrose, P. S. Jennings, D. H. Bates, Samuel McMillan, Rush W. Taggart, John A. Fordyce, Charles A. Clegg, Frank C. Loveland. The members of the banquet committee wore a buckeye brown badge, and those of the reception committee a blue badge.

It was an occasion of rare interest. Said the New York Tribune on the morning following: "The annual dinner of the Ohio Society of New York has ever been a joyous occasion since the first one was held ten years ago. Since then the Society has added greatly to its strength and numbers, but its character remains unchanged. Now as then, the annual dinner is a jovial and cheery gathering of the New York men who were once Ohio boys. Now, as then, the chief employment of the diners is to sound the praises and compare the relative merits of the only two states on earth. Delmonico's could not comfortably have held more of the children of Ohio than were gathered there last evening; nor could it have sheltered a more congenial company. Men of all political stripes discarded their political animosities and the lion and the lamb sat down together."

The president of the Society, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, sat beneath the shield of Ohio and presided over this love feast. Upon his right sat the governor of Ohio, Asa S. Bushnell, who had come with his staff in order to be present, and who announced that he would travel a thousand miles any time to repeat the performance. United States Senator Joseph R. Hawley sat upon the president's left, and his remarks gave rise to the most interesting demonstration of the evening. The Senator had just finished begging his hearers to give Congress more credit for disinterested motives, when he added that his heart was full just then of other national matters that he would love to talk about. This assurance evoked plenty of enthusiastic requests that the senator should unburden his mind, and this he proceeded to do. He mentioned the arbitration treaty just signed by Secretary Olney and the British ambassador, and added that he had about made up his mind to vote for it. This statement brought out such a roar of cheers as left no doubt of what the Ohio Society thought of the matter.

"I'm naturally glad you approve of my intentions," said the senator, "but I should hate to put it to a vote."

"Vote! vote!" cried half a hundred voices at once.

"All those who favor the treaty," said the senator, "will please rise." Not more than a dozen men kept their seats, and there was another storm of cheers.

"Those who are opposed," went on Senator Hawley, "or who do not want to rise can keep their seats."

General Horace Porter sat by Senator Hawley, and there were also at the guest table Senator Calvin S. Brice, Congressman Charles H. Grosvenor, James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland; George R. Blanchard, John W. Vrooman, representing the Holland Society; the Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, Hon. R. W. Taylor, and eight members of Governor Bushnell's staff, namely, General H. H. Axline, General W. P. Orr, Col. H. H. Prettyman, Col. C. E. Burke, Col. H. L. Kingsley, Col. R. C. McKinney, Col. Alexander Gordon and Captain R. E. Burdick.

The members who sat at the head and foot of each of the other tables were as follows: A, A. D. Juilliard and George Milmine; B, Andrew J. C.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Foyé and William L. Brown; C, S. S. Packard and Homer Lee; D, W. L. Strong and Anson G. McCook; E, Milton I. Southard and Samuel Thomas; F, George E. Armstrong and C. N. Hoagland.

The menu made a charming souvenir of the occasion, faced as it was with the brown of Ohio and the seal of the state pictured at the top. The balcony sent down sweet sounds of instrumental harmony during the progress of the dinner, and afterward it contained a number of the wives of the diners. Among them were Mrs. W. L. Strong, Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. Homer Lee, Mrs. S. S. Packard, Mrs. A. J. C. Foyé, Mrs. Colgate Hoyt, Mrs. James H. Hoyt, Mrs. Anson G. McCook and Mrs. Sanford.

The Rev. Dr. Eliot said grace before the guests sat down and the brevity of his prayer was startling in the extreme. "As God was with the fathers, so may He be with the sons. Amen," said he. In astonishment the company broke into applause.

General Burnett, in calling the guests to order, referred to the gathering as an expression of love toward their native state. "But the love of our native state," he said, "does not lessen our loyalty to the state of our adoption. We are proud of her greatness and her imperial position among the states of the land." General Burnett then called for the company to drink to the president of the United States and to the flag. The toast was drunk standing. At once the band began to play "The Star-Spangled Banner," and all of the two hundred and fifty guests took up the song, accompanying their vocal efforts with the waving of handkerchiefs and napkins.

In introducing Governor Bushnell, General Burnett referred to him as an anomaly in that, although he was a native of New York, he was governor of Ohio. The governor of Ohio got an extremely hearty reception as he rose to speak. "From the cordiality of my reception," said he, "I can see that we are all friends. You see I take you into partnership and say 'we.' Sometimes it is more difficult to form partnerships. There was once a young fellow who worked in a country clothing store. One morning he got to the store early and as he was washing the windows his employer came up. 'I guess we shall have rain to-day,' said the boy. His employer looked at him with a scowl. 'Since when did you get into the firm?' said he. New York and Ohio are still neck and neck, for while you have given the country a president for four years, we shall give it one for the four years to come. (Applause.) In still another thing honors are even. The chief executive of Ohio is a New Yorker, but the chief executive of New York is an Ohioan."

(Here Mayor Strong tried to look as if he were deaf.)

Governor Bushnell went on to name some of the great men of Ohio and New York and to glorify them in the true spirit. He finished by saying that the Ohio Society could have him at its dinner any time it would let him know when the dinner was to take place.

Senator Hawley, who was well received, after referring to the names of many prominent men of Connecticut who had served their country well in the national legislature, went on to ask that a more charitable spirit should be observed by the American people toward Congress and the government. For twenty-two years, he said, he had been in the halls of legislation, and he could bear testimony that not in the world was there a more faithful, steady or honest body of legislators than the men who composed the Congress of the United States. He challenged his hearers also to point out any instance during the last hundred years where any foreign rulers had shown more honor, patriotism and efficient administration than the presidents of the United States.

By gradual stages Senator Hawley found his way to the subject of the arbitration treaty. Its first mention was greeted with loud cheers, which drew from the senator this remark: "I think I could get a vote here on this question, but I doubt if two-thirds would vote" The remainder of Senator Hawley's sentence was lost in cries of "Vote, vote!" which was so prolonged that at last he shouted: "Well, I will take a vote: those in favor of arbitration will please stand up." Then occurred the incident already described.

"I should vote for the ratification of the treaty," continued Mr. Hawley, "largely because I don't think there can be any harm in it. But I am free to confess that I should like to have precede it a declaration on the part of Great Britain that she will cease that doctrine of extension, seizure of land and robbery of territory that she has avowedly pursued for many generations. If you read Prof. Seely's work on the expansion"—Senator Hawley got no further with his sentence. His mention of a name that has been on the lips of New Yorkers for the last two or three weeks (the Seeley dinner of not pleasant fame) seemed to strike his auditors with a particularly humorous force. And when he described the guests as "irreverent and unappreciative of the subject at issue," the laughter broke out afresh. Continuing at length, he said: "Arbitration! Why is it ever necessary to coax the United States to arbitration? We are always ready for arbitration. But I would ask you to pause and consider those words of Lord Chief Justice Russell, who, when speaking during his recent visit at Saratoga, stated there were questions that no self-respecting nation could arbitrate. It is almost comical that in this very treaty there is left out one of the most serious questions that should claim our attention, and that is the boundary of Alaska. After all, this treaty is only for five years, but I warn you that if any wrong arises, or if any serious insult is given to the American people, they will fight to the death."

The Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot spoke next, and in part he said:

"Ere yet the Empire state yields the sceptre to her Western sister, let this be said, that if the new administration finds the country at peace with foreign nations; with a substantial gold reserve in the treasury, and a reformed civil service, it will owe that advantage chiefly to the steady will and sound sense of a son of New York. If the incoming president finds the executive chair securely based, it will be because it has been held down by an outgoing president whose moral courage and imperturbable Americanism have stood the test of hostile abuse and partisan spite. If William McKinley finds us a state worth governing it is chiefly due to the downright honesty of purpose, the clear grit of Grover Cleveland. He has enjoyed the beatitude of malediction—an honor gained only by men who refuse to answer the multitude according to their idols. Let it not be said that American citizens, of whatever party allegiance, fail to do justice to the immovable purpose and the iron nerve that have preserved our financial integrity and maintained the true dignity of our national honor.

“Gentlemen, the incoming president will need, as seldom man has done, the hearty support of all intelligent and well-disposed citizens. The new administration will, in deed, be confronted by momentous problems. In the support of the great principle of business integrity in the financial operations of the government, we are all one. Against the extravagant wastefulness of our congressional log-rolling, and all demoralizing jobbery, let us oppose a protest of simple lives and thrifty habits. Against the greed of selfish monopolies, seeking to fatten on the unnecessary taxation of the many for the benefit of the few, to enrich one producer at the expense of a thousand consumers, let us oppose the irrefutable logic not only of justice, but of clear political expediency.”

When Dr. Eliot resumed his seat, Senator Hawley arose, and, alluding to that part of the former's remarks about opposition to the arbitration treaty as being due to personal spite on the part of some senators, protested against the use of the term. “I represent here to-night,” Senator Hawley said, “the senate and my brother senators, and can say that no question of spite enters into our deliberations. I hope our friend, Dr. Eliot, does not attribute spite either to myself or other senators. We are sent there for the express purpose of keeping cool, weighing everything calmly, and to wait to see what the other side does.”

Hon. James H. Hoyt was introduced with encomiums by the president, and he was warmly received. In the course of his address he said:

“Our next President, with all the power of his office, and with all his shining qualifications of mind and heart, cannot accomplish much without the support of the people of the United States. This is a critical period in American history. Sometimes we may well doubt whether our government has passed beyond the experimental stage. Free institutions are on trial. The next four years must necessarily be eventful, history-making years. I do not speak of causes, but of facts. Our revenues are insufficient; our monetary system is defective; our poor are too envious of the rich, and our rich are too unmindful of the poor. Combinations, both of labor and of capital, threaten the peace of the republic. Our civilization is splendid, but it is selfish. Our business interests languish; our laborers are unemployed; we are threatened with serious complications not only at home, but abroad. Our people are discontented and unhappy. Our next President is confronted with towering difficulties. It remains to be seen whether, in this crisis of the republic, the American people, as they have been in other crises, will be unselfishly patriotic. If they are, our next President can accomplish much; if they are not, he can do nothing. We need his leadership, but, above all, he needs our help. Let us forget private interest and think only of public interests. Let us forget self and remember the State."

Among the other speakers were Gen. Horace Porter, Hon. Charles H. Grosvenor, Judge Charles H. Truax and Hon. R. W. Taylor.

Before the governing committee, on February 8th, Homer Lee, on behalf of the art committee, suggested that the rooms of the Society be fitted up for an art exhibition. After some discussion Gen. Burnett moved that the art committee be empowered to prepare the rooms as desired, provided that the money therefor be raised by private subscription, and that the Society be not called upon to bear any share of the expense; and, further, that the art committee be authorized to arrange for three evening entertainments, to be held under the management and direction of the entertainment committee; the sole expense to be not more than fifty dollars for each of these evening entertainments. The motion was carried. Mr. Lee, at the meeting of the Society on the same night, reported this action and explained that it was proposed to have one smoker and two nights of receptions to the ladies. The exhibition was held in accordance with these arrangements.

The meeting of April 12th took the form of a dinner at Morelli's. Judge Higley reported for the entertainment committee that a ladies' reception and dance would be held at the Waldorf on the evening of April 22d. The price of tickets for members and their guests was fixed at $2.50, which would cover the charges of the Hotel Waldorf, and that the Society would bear the expense of music and printing.

After business was over the president called upon ex-Mayor Otis, of Cleveland, for a speech. Mr. Otis delegated that duty to Col. William L. Brown, who responded in a very happy speech, the burden of which was that he owed no man anything except good will. General Swayne was called upon and dwelt with emphasis upon the duty of the members of the Society to participate in the movement looking to the purchase of the house of Rufus Putnam, and setting it apart as a memorial of the Ohio Company, which started from the house to found the new state in 1788.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The ladies' reception was pronounced a success, in the report made by the entertainment committee to the Society on May 10th, here quoted:

"Gentlemen: Your entertainment committee, by direction of the Society, and under the approval of the governing committee, made all the necessary arrangements for the ladies' reception and dance, given at the Waldorf on Thursday evening of Easter week, April 22, 1897.

"This form of entertainment was decided upon after careful inquiry and due deliberation, and the Waldorf was selected as being the most desirable place for the entertainment to be given. Arrangements were made with the Waldorf for the use of the large ballroom and the smaller ballroom for that evening, and an extensive collation to be served at small tables, beginning at 11 o'clock and continuing through the dance, for $2.50 for each person, under a general guarantee that there should not be less than 150 attending.

"To the entertainment committee were added the reception and the floor committees, and to these two committees we are greatly indebted for the pleasures of the evening. The floor committee did admirable service in arranging the most excellent and attractive order of dances, giving the music for each and in managing the dances to the delight of all who took part.

"The reception was held in the large ballroom from 9 to 10:30, where members of the Society and their guests were cordially received by the hostesses of the evening—Mrs. Henry L. Burnett and Mrs. William L. Strong. Mrs. Calvin S. Brice was expecting to be present and assist, but owing to sudden illness was prevented from doing so. I may be permitted to say that the active interest manifested by Mrs. Burnett and Mrs. Strong contributed largely to the success of this entertainment, and the thanks of the Society are due to them for their good offices in this behalf.

"There were something over 200 who attended this reception and dance. I think the facts will bear out the assertion that the entertainment was from every standpoint an eminent success.

"The lateness of the season militated against a larger attendance. Some of the members had already gone to Europe who would otherwise have been present; others had gone to the country, and then the winter had been filled with various entertainments until the people had in many instances become satiated. Still the attendance was good, being over 200, and the entertainment was up to the Ohio standard.

"Should the Society decide to give similar entertainments in the future, the committee strongly recommends that they be given before the Lenten season, when, with the same preparations and efforts made and put forth in this last entertainment, we could well look for the number of 500. The Society has never made a mistake in the ladies' receptions and entertainments it has thus far given. They have always been delightful to the ladies and the gentlemen alike.

“ Respectfully submitted,
“ WARREN HIGLEY, Chairman Ent. Com.”

The committee referred to in this report were constituted as follows: Entertainment committee, Warren Higley, chairman; Colgate Hoyt, P. Bradlee Strong, Mahlon Chance, David Homer Bates, Jr. Reception committee, William L. Strong, chairman; Wager Swayne, Calvin S. Brice, Wallace C. Andrews, William L. Brown, Samuel Thomas, John D. Archbold, Frank C. Loveland, Warren F. Leland, David H. Bates, Henry Hobart Vail, George P. Tangeman, Emerson McMillan, L. C. Hopkins, Frederick C. Train, D. F. Harbaugh, William S. Hawk, with the officers and governing committee. Floor committee, David Homer Bates, Jr., chairman; Andrew Ernest Foyé, P. Bradlee Strong, James Alfred Chard, Charles F. Bostwick, Allison R. Hopkins, Emmet B. Wheeler, William H. Caldwell, Henry B. C. Plimpton, Peter H. Burnett.

The following was the concert program:

Overture—Lustspiel, Kela Bela.

Selection—Wizard of the Nile, Herbert.

Concert Gavotte—Hearts and Flowers, Tobani.

Selection—Rob Roy, De Koven.

Cavalleria Rusticana—Intermezzo, Mascagni.

Selection—Lady Slavey, Kerker.

Steps were taken in the early summer of this year (1897) by the governing committee looking to a more desirable home for the Society. On June 23d it was ordered that a committee to consist of Henry B. Wilson, T. H. Wheeler and Andrew J. C. Foyé be appointed to examine rooms at the new Astoria Hotel* for the use of the Ohio Society, and report to the governing committee. At the meeting of October 11th Mr. Foyé made a preliminary report for the committee, and stated that they had negotiated a lease for a suite on the fourteenth floor of the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, with service, light and heat, and with the privileges of the hotel generally; and, particularly of the billiard room, restaurant and roof garden, with easy access to the rooms, at an annual rental of $2,600. He stated that the lease would begin May 1, 1898. The report was approved, and the president was authorized and instructed to sign the lease.

Judge Higley presented a photograph of Gov. Asa L. Bushnell and his staff, and offered the following resolution:

* It will be recalled that the Hotel Waldorf was first constructed and opened, and that the “Astoria” end of the house was an after consideration.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York accept with thanks the large and beautiful photograph of Gov. Asa L. Bushnell and his staff, with the assurance that it will ever after hang upon our walls as a pleasant reminder of our noted banquets of the years of 1896 and 1897, and of the distinguished honor they conferred on us by coming all the way from Ohio to be our guests and to enjoy with us those happy occasions.

“Resolved, That the recording secretary be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to Gov. Asa L. Bushnell and to Colonel Burke of his staff.”

The following response was received from Governor Bushnell:

“OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, COLUMBUS, O., Nov. 12, 1897.

“Noah H. Swayne, Recording Secretary Ohio Society of New York.

“Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of November 8th, in which you communicate the resolution adopted by the Ohio Society of New York, relating to the photograph of the staff and myself. Permit me to offer my thanks to the Society and yourself for the honor thus accorded and to say that we retain the most pleasant recollections of the hospitality shown us by the Ohio Society of New York. Trusting that at some time in the future I may have the pleasure of meeting yourself and your associates, I am,

“Very cordially yours,

“ASA S. BUSHNELL.”

The following gentlemen served as the nominating committee selected this year: F. H. Kingsbury, R. J. Chard, E. A. Follett, W. H. Eckert, D. H. Bates, A. D. Houston, Ralph W. Carroll. At the meeting of November 8th Mr. Chard reported that they had prepared the following ticket: President, Henry L. Burnett; vice-presidents, S. S. Packard, Milton I. Southard, Andrew J. C. Foyé, George E. Armstrong, A. D. Juilliard; secretary, Evarts L. Prentiss; recording secretary, Noah H. Swayne; for treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, Thomas Ewing, Samuel McMillan, J. C. Hoagland.

The president announced that the annual meeting would be held at Morrelli's on November 29th, and that a dinner complimentary to the members would be furnished at that time.

The president then called upon Prof. Packard to take the chair, and then referred to Mayor Strong's remarks at the dinner given in his honor three years ago, to the effect that “My own impression is that in about three years from now you gentlemen will be mighty sorry that you gave me this dinner,” and proposed that the next annual dinner be a testimonial for Colonel Strong. This proposition was enthusiastically received, and the president announced that he would advise that the dinner be held as soon after January 1st as possible.

At the annual meeting, held on the date above named, Mr. Chard, as chairman of the governing committee, presented the annual report to the effect that twenty-five resident and ten non-resident members had been elected and had qualified during the year. Mr. Crall presented his annual report as treasurer. The report of the secretary was as follows:

“To the president and members of the Ohio Society of New York, the secretary has the honor to submit the following report: The by-laws prescribe that the secretary shall conduct the correspondence of the Society, issue notices of all meetings, keep the roll of members, furnish information on call of any of the committees, and discharge such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Society or the president. Pursuant to such regulations, notices have been issued announcing eleven meetings or entertainments since the last annual election. It may not be out of place to recite rapidly the occasions of our coming together. The first meeting was held at the rooms of the Society on December 14, 1896, when the committees were announced and arrangements made for the annual banquet. This meeting was followed by a ladies' night on January 11th. On the 16th of the same month the members of the Society and their guests gathered about Delmonico's tables at the eleventh annual banquet and our last feast in that old place of entertainment. A musicale given by the College Alumni Quartette at the Society's quarters distinguished our gathering on the second Monday of February. From the 26th of February to the 8th of March a notable collection of pictures by American artists was on exhibition at our rooms and was viewed by a large number of members and their friends. We assembled for an informal dinner at this place (Morelli's) on the 12th of April, and on April 22d the entertainment season of the Society ended with a reception and dance at the Waldorf. We last convened before the summer on the 10th of May at our rooms. The first meetings of the present season were held at 236 Fifth avenue on the second Mondays of October and November. The entertainments of the Society during the past season, by reason of their variety and character, gave unusual pleasure to all who participated in them and were creditable to the organization and to the committees having them in charge.

“Announcements of the meetings and entertainments enumerated have been given through the mails to the members at the addresses furnished by them. The practice has been to post the notices so that a member living so far distant as Chicago might receive word in season to attend the meeting which they announced. Observation of the workings of the city mail service has discovered the fact that we erred in our calculations. A notice mailed at the Madison Square branch on the 4th of October arrived at its destination in Wall street on the morning of the fourth day afterward, about the time required to travel leisurely from New York to Chicago and back again. A notice mailed November 1, 1897, arrived at the same destination on the 4th of November. After further observation and experiment the facts were called to the attention of the postmaster, who has investigated the matter, and we are promised more satisfactory service in the future.

“The membership roll has shown a steady and encouraging growth in the past two years. Thirty-eight candidates were proposed for membership during the year ending November 29, 1896, and 41 proposals were received during the year just past. The proposals during 1897 were made by 19 different members. Since the last annual meeting three of our number have been called away. We have on our membership roll at the present time 278 resident members, 88 non-resident and 4 honorary members, making in all 370 against 337 in 1895.

“It is worthy of note that through the efficient management of the house committee and of our custodian, the rooms of the Society and the collections they contain have presented always a most pleasing and orderly appearance. Thirty-five portraits of members and of distinguished Ohioans have been obtained during the year through the efforts of the custodian and added to the large number already collected by him and arranged upon the walls. Through Judge Higley a finely executed photograph of Gov. Asa S. Bushnell and his staff was presented to the Society.

“The record of visitors has been carefully kept by the custodian and shows that during the year over eighteen hundred visits have been paid at the rooms by members, their friends and Ohioans sojourning in the city. This is about four times the number received during the year preceding. In addition to this number eight hundred and more persons were received during the art exhibition. These figures and facts seem to show a wider interest in the Society and greater attractions in its abiding place.

“The outlook seems auspicious. Probably before the next annual meeting the Society will be situated in its new home at the Waldorf-Astoria. More pretentious quarters and an environment most convenient and superb can scarcely fail to invite a better and more regular attendance of members to our rooms and make membership in the Ohio Society of larger advantage and value than it has ever been.

“Respectfully submitted,

“EVARTS L. PRENTISS, Secretary.”

The election of officers being called for, the secretary was unanimously instructed to cast one ballot for the gentlemen proposed by the nominating committee. The Society was entertained by remarks by Gen. J. Warren Keifer, ex-speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and by Mr. Chance and Mr. Southard. Mr. Crall moved that the secretary be instructed to send the cordial greetings of this Society to the Ohio Society of California and the Ohio Society of St. Louis. Carried. The president announced the following banquet committee, with the statement that he had not included in it any of the beneficiaries of the mayor: Calvin S. Brice, Whitelaw Reid, George Hoadly, Jno. J. McCook, Wager Swayne, Abner McKinley, J. Q. A. Ward, E. B. Thomas, Leander H. Crall, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Geo. E. Armstrong, A. D. Juilliard, Colgate Hoyt, S. S. Packard, Milton I. Southard, Wm. L. Brown, Warren Higley, D. H. Bates, Mahlon Chance, Emerson McMillan, P. F. Collier, W. S. Hawk. Mr. Hawk resigned later, and Mr. Prentiss was selected by the committee to fill the vacancy.

At the meeting of December 13th Mr. Chard moved that a resolution of condolence to the President of the United States, upon the death of his mother be adopted by the Society. The chair appointed Messrs. Chard, Higley and Wilson, who later in the evening presented the following:

“Whereas, The Ohio Society of New York has learned with the deepest regret of the passing away of the aged and revered mother of an honored member of our Society, the President of the United States; therefore,

“Resolved, That this Society extends to President McKinley the expression of its sincerest sympathy and condolence in this hour of his great bereavement.”

The report was adopted, and the secretary was instructed to forward a copy of the resolutions to the President. The president announced the standing committees as follows: Literature and art, Homer Lee, H. T. Waltman, J. Q. A. Ward, Wm. S. Hawk, Geo. W. Perkins. Entertainment, Warren Higley, P. Bradlee Strong, David H. Bates, Jr., Noah H. Swayne 2d, Wm. H. Caldwell. Library, P. F. Collier, C. C. Shayne, Abner McKinley, Daniel Pritchard, Jno. D. Archbold. Auditing, Henry A. Glassford, L. C. Hopkins, F. C. Loveland, H. H. Brockway, J. Stedman Converse.

The following acknowledgment of the above resolutions of sympathy was received at a later date:

“EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, Dec. 28, 1897.

“My Dear Sir: At the request of the President and in his behalf I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 21st instant, transmitting a copy of the preamble and resolutions of the Ohio Society of New York in regard to the death of the President’s mother. The President wishes me to assure you, and through you the Society, that the words of tender sympathy contained in these resolutions are gratefully appreciated by him and will be lastingly remembered.

“Very sincerely yours,

“JOHN ADDISON PORTER, Secretary to the President.

“Mr. Evarts L. Prentiss, Secretary Ohio Society of New York.”

THE twelfth annual banquet of the Ohio Society was given, as has been already indicated, in honor of Hon. Wm. L. Strong, who had recently retired from the office of mayor of New York. It was the first one given by the Society at the Waldorf-Astoria. The date was Saturday, January 8, 1898. The dinner was held in the beautiful Astor Gallery, one of the show rooms of the big hotel, and was attended by about two hundred members of the Society and a number of their guests. The numerous small tables at which the guests sat were luxuriantly decorated with roses and green things of various sorts, most of which eventually found their way into the galleries where sat many of the wives and sisters of the Ohioans, to view the festivities below.

Gen. Henry L. Burnett, president of the Society, sat in the centre of the guests' table, and at his right sat Colonel Strong, the guest of honor. At his left sat Bishop Potter. Others at the table were ex-Attorney-General Judson Harmon; James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland; ex-Senator Calvin S. Brice, John W. Vrooman, E. M. Harmon, Charles W. Mackey, Edward S. Wilson, William Lyall, General Wager Swayne and Chancellor MacCracken. Among those present in the gallery were Mrs. W. L. Strong, Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. Homer Lee, Mrs. S. S. Packard, Miss Packard, Mrs. A. D. Shattuck, Miss Aborn, Mrs. E. S. Wallace, Mrs. T. H. Wheeler, Mrs. Bealle, Mrs. Andrew J. C. Foyé, Mrs. Southard, Mrs. Bates, Mrs. Freeman Ward, Mrs. Penfield and Mrs. McMillan.

The menu cards were singularly artistic and appropriate. Upon the face of the document was the buckeye in fac-simile, and beneath it were the lines:

The friendly buckeye leaves expand,
Five-fingered, like an open hand
Of trust and brotherhood the sign—
Be welcome! What is mine is thine.

Inside the leaves was an excellent portrait of Colonel Strong done in half-tone. The menu card was so popular that the supply was not equal to the demand.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The members of the Society and their guests began to find their way to the Astor Gallery at 6.30 o'clock. They were greeted by the reception committee, which consisted of the following gentlemen: William Ford Upson, chairman; George P. Tangeman, Edward S. Wallace, H. H. Waltman, Quinton Corwine, W. H. Caldwell, H. R. De Milt, Homer Lee, Paul D. Cravath, Charles F. Dean, James G. Newcomb, Samuel McMillan, Edgar A. Follett, Henry B. Wilson, Frank Brainerd.

An informal reception was held in the spacious ante-chamber, and soon after 7 o'clock the guests sat down to dinner. From that time on the succession of good things was incessant and jollity and good feeling ran high. The band in the gallery varied its "all the popular tunes of the day" with an occasional old-fashioned or patriotic song, in which the guests joined heartily, being assisted oftentimes by the soprano voices in the gallery. The ladies, while spectators, were by no means neglected, and there was an almost constant procession of the diners from the floor to the galleries, where a second informal reception was in progress.

The Ohioans never do things in a half-hearted fashion, and, having determined to show their appreciation of the manner in which their fellow-member, Colonel Strong, guarded the tremendous trust imposed upon him by the citizens of the city of New York, they did it in their characteristically thorough fashion.

Colonel Strong was besieged during the course of the dinner by friends, who wished to grasp his hand, and all the speakers, highly eulogistic as they were, only voiced the sentiments of the guests who loudly applauded their words.

General Burnett set the keynote of the dinner when he said, in calling the guests to order: "We come here to-night to say to our comrade and companion who has served for three years as mayor of New York: 'You have done well, you have faithfully discharged your duties and you have laid aside the robes of office upon which there is neither spot nor soil.'"

Secretary Sherman, Senator Allison and Abram S. Hewitt were at first expected to be present, but were unavoidably detained. The speakers who were present, however, including Bishop Potter, James H. Hoyt, ex-Attorney-General Harmon, General Burnett and others, expressed the esteem in which the Society held its guests in graceful and clever after-dinner fashion.

Gen. Henry L. Burnett called the guests to order at 9.30 o'clock, and in opening the after-dinner exercises spoke as follows:

"Fellow members of the Ohio Society and their guests: To the guests we give greeting and welcome, and we will not forget the ladies. We welcome you to this, our twelfth annual banquet, and permit me to say to the members of the Ohio Society that the last year has been the most prosperous financially and in increase of numbers of any year of our existence.

“We are strong, loyal to each other, prosperous in all material respects and look forward to a prosperous, happy and loving future. We found our quarters on Fifth Avenue small for our numbers, and as you see we had these buildings erected for us. (Laughter and applause.) We had them reasonably and artistically decorated and furnished. These are now our headquarters, where we receive and welcome all of our Ohio friends without money and without price. Others may come who are not so fortunate as to be members or born in Ohio and pay the price.

“Our friend and manager, our steward, Mr. Boldt, takes charge of these quarters for us and we are reasonably well satisfied with his management. Mr. Boldt intended to be born in Ohio. He started from Belgium or Germany, his parents did, but by some little mistake in the date he was born in Pennsylvania and did not reach Ohio. He has spread, as you see, throughout the various rooms some plants that he thought were buckeyes. They are not; they are palms. But when you assemble here again all these rooms now called palm rooms will be filled with buckeye trees and you will feel quite at home.

“Now, my friends, in assembling here to-night, at this, our twelfth annual banquet, let us commence our exercises seriously by sending to our comrade, companion in this order, the man, William McKinley, our sympathy and greeting over his late bereavement. Our hearts go out to him in deep love and sympathy in that greatest trial any human soul ever knows, the severance of that tenderest and purest relation that exists on earth, the love of mother and son. To him we send our love and sympathy.

“And now, friends, to your feet, and to the President of the United States, and to the flag of our country we give our first toast. (Cheers and applause; “America” sung.)

“Before passing from the question of our Society I desire to say that our example here, to our comrades, has been followed by sister societies having been formed in Chicago, St. Louis and San Francisco. The youngest of the sisterhood is the San Francisco Society, and from them I have a little message that I desire to read: ‘On behalf of the Ohio Society of California I acknowledge the receipt of your cordial greetings and thank you. We know of no way to give expression of our good will better than to wish you the perpetuation of your past. The advice of Emerson to hitch your wagon to a star we have adopted. Our star is your Society.’ (Cries of “Good” and applause.)

“Three years ago and a little more, when our president was about laying down or ending his term of office, Colonel Strong (much applause), there was a general expression on the part of the members to have an opportunity to meet him and to express to him their esteem and their love for him as a man, to take him by the hand as he was about to enter upon the new office to which he had just been elected, mayor of the city of New York, and to say to him, 'Godspeed,' 'God be with you,' and to express to the people of New York our confidence that they had elected a man who would honestly, fearlessly, cleanly administer the affairs of this great city; that he was of that stuff of which good officers are made, and therefore and then we gave him a banquet and sent him on his new way with our blessing and with expressions of our confidence. On that occasion Colonel Strong took occasion to say, 'This banquet is well enough, but perhaps at the end of my official career you will not be quite so free and willing to give me a banquet.' To that doubt of his this night is the response. (Applause.)

"We come here to-night to say to our companion and comrade of this order, to the man who has served three years as mayor of New York, elected by its people, 'You have done well,' 'You have faithfully discharged your duties,' 'You have laid off the robes of office upon which there is neither spot nor soilure.' 'You have administered your trust faithfully in the interests of the people, the citizenship of New York, and we welcome you back into our ranks with outstretched hands and with warm hearts.'

"I cannot detain you because it is not the province of the toastmaster to take the time of the guests and of the members. Colonel Strong, perhaps by reason of his native modesty and his not being used to much public speaking, would not like to immediately respond to this toast, and therefore to Mayor Strong's administration and Mayor Strong as our guest to-night I bid you all rise and drink. (Much applause. All present arose and drank.)

"Now, I do not propose to ask Colonel Strong immediately while the blushes are still suffusing his face, to respond to this toast, and in place of Colonel Strong I call upon one whom I fancy there is no man who observes the physical life of New York, its material prosperity with closer, keener eye, and no man who has in his heart the welfare, spiritual and moral, the uplifting of the better part of all the life of New York, than the man whom I now present, Bishop Potter of New York."

Bishop Potter said: "According to the instructions, gentlemen, which I have received from the chairman I am to make Colonel Strong's speech. There are difficulties in the way of the discharge of that task, for the Colonel has a facility in the use of emphatic language (laughter), which if I were to indulge would hardly be regarded as canonical. When he began his task, knowing his characteristics in that direction, I assured him privately that I would issue to him a license for what was called the power of anathema within discreet limits. I am not sure that he has always confined himself to these limits, and I am quite free to say, now that I am permitted to address him unofficially, that I am not at all sure that if I had been in his place I should have done any better.

“On one occasion, in the house of bishops of which I am a member, a very brilliant man, known, I fancy, to a good many in this room should I mention his name, and who has now gone to his rest, had the misfortune, which is quite possible, let me say, to bishops as well as other men, to lose his temper and indulge in language which was not altogether parliamentary, and for which the next morning he felt constrained, when the house of bishops assembled, to apologize. He did so in a most noble and manly way. But then he added: ‘I feel constrained to say that in view of the irritations to which one is subjected who has a seat in this body, that I think that this Right Reverend House should set forth a form of words to be used by a Christian man under circumstances of great provocation.’ It was in accordance with the spirit of that protest and entreaty that I gave to my friend the Colonel the license to which I have referred.

“I am extremely glad to be permitted in any sense to reply for him to-day. I have a relation to Ohio, though I was not born in it, or, as somebody who has spelled the word ‘born’ with the addition of a letter ‘e,’ borne from it, for in my early ministry I was honored with an invitation to become the president of Kenyon College. I was not able to accept it, but somebody said to me many years afterward: ‘What is the reason that you always speak of Kenyon College in such an extremely tender manner?’ ‘Well,’ I said, ‘I suppose my attitude toward Kenyon College and Ohio is very much that of the young woman who has received an offer of marriage. She may have felt constrained to decline it, but she always entertains a great admiration of the good taste of the man who made it.’ I think you will see, gentlemen, that I have a very personal reason for loving Ohio, and if I had not I confess I love it for what Ohio has given to New York. As one looks over this room to-night he must be impressed as I have been, and as I said to my friend on the left, with the physical qualities of the men who are made in Ohio. They build you large there, gentlemen. I do not mean Hoyt particularly, except at this end (pointing to the head); it is as Mr. Hoyt said, the contrast between the physical aspect of a body of men at the New England dinner and at this dinner is significant, and that Mr. Boldt under these conditions should have met your expectations, gentlemen, does him great honor.

“But there is still another reason why I am glad to come here to-night and express my gratitude to Ohio. Ohio gave us, gentlemen, our most distinguished guest of this evening, and in his lineage there has been mixed two strains which I think have had a pre-eminent value in the building of the civilization of the land of which you and I are citizens. I have been catechising the Colonel as to his ancestry to-night, for he is under my spiritual jurisdiction, and he tells me that his father was born in Connecticut, and that the mother was born in Pennsylvania, but was Holland Dutch. There are two of the three strains that have made our civilization from its early history. They were Huguenot, they were Dutch, they were English. The land that gave us our language, the people who settled in Connecticut, and the land that gave to Colonel Strong his mother gave to us the men who have laid the foundation of New Amsterdam, and out of these two strains, pre-eminently, I venture to say, have come a great deal that is best and noblest in our American civilization. We are glad that it has given us the man who sits here to-night, who, I think, illustrates some of the best and finest qualities of that civilization.

“Mayor Strong has his infirmities. One of them I have already alluded to. (Laughter.) The other I should be disposed to say was his weakness for tea (laughter), but if you will observe closely, gentlemen, in the immediate neighborhood of the place at which he sits to-night there is no tea there. When it comes to dining with a body of Ohio men he don't want it. On the contrary, we remember to-night, and I venture to say that I speak for the intelligence and character and substance of the city of which I am proud to be a citizen to-night, we remember those distinguished virtues which have adorned his official career, and which, I think, crown it with a distinct and exceptional lustre.

“A Celtic gentleman speaking of a fellow countryman who had been an alderman in the town in which they both lived, said of his predatory habits: ‘Bedad, sor, if he should land on an uninhabited island and be met on landing by a tribe of naked savages, he would have his hand in the pocket of every one of them before sundown.’ (Laughter.)

“I wonder if it has ever struck you as it has struck me that from the beginning to the close of his stainless administration, nobody has ever dared to insinuate that the man who has held for the last three years the office of the mayor of the city of New York was going out one single copper richer for it. (Great applause.) No most audacious or unscrupulous foe has ever for one instant ventured to suggest it. What a tribute to the quality of the man! To his absolute singleness of purpose, to his entire consecration of himself and his best gifts to a great public. With what patience he has administered that office, with what singular and scrupulous courtesy he has received everybody who has come to him—I hope tradition and courtesy will not vanish from that office—with what invariable gentleness he has listened to every one!

“My wife said to me once: ‘How much happier we would all be if you had a temper like Colonel Strong.’ (Laughter.) I have no doubt that Mrs. Strong knows the difference. We cannot all have tempers like Colonel Strong, but I venture to think that we may aspire to have an integrity as fine and as high as his is, to give to a great office our best gifts with constant unflinching devotion; to let no gout—I wonder where he got it with that ancestry?—to let no twinge of the gout ruffle his temper or impede his faithfulness to public duty, and to sit here as he has done to-night with the consciousness of whatever may be the future of New York. God bless it, say we all; he has given the service of a clear, vigorous mind and of trained powers, and of a high order of intelligence to advancing its best interests, and absolute and utter unselfishness. Now what is the one conviction which the experience of such an office has taught him? I confess for myself that among the things I admire and love there are few that I admire more than the quality in him of being taught by great place and recognizing the significance in its highest aspects of the responsibilities of public office. I do not forget that he is a Republican. So am I, my dear mayor. I do not think you have always believed it. I do not forget that he has striven to be loyal to the party of which he has always been an honored member. But I was profoundly impressed the other day in reading an interview in which he said that the conviction with which he was going out of office, as to that office itself, was that it was a position which required business ability and that the business of being a good mayor was substantially the business quality of being a good man of business anywhere. In other words, that the public had a right to look for honesty, fidelity, capacity in great public officers. When you have said these three things, you have stated the qualities of a great public officer, and when the city and state and the nation have gotten hold of those three principles they are precisely the same qualities that we have come here to-night to honor and rejoice in.

“I notice, gentlemen, and I call the attention of the angels who grace the upper airs (laughter and applause at the reference to the ladies in the balcony), who have been looking down upon us to-night, to the fact that a few moments ago they apparently have removed them largely, the tables other than this one were adorned with red roses, but when it came to the table at which our guest was seated, my dear and honored friend on the right, the rose which was placed at his plate and which appropriately he wears at this moment upon his breast, was a white rose, true symbol of his stainless integrity and his pure and noble record.”

President Burnett said: “At our former banquet, to which I alluded, we had present with us the governor of the state of Ohio, who had known Colonel Strong long and well, and he had this to say in a brief speech which he gave us that evening. The words seem to me especially fitting to what Bishop Potter has just said: ‘I counted myself fortunate to be in the city on this occasion when my kinsmen from the state of Ohio, represented in this association were assembled to do honor to their old president and to the mayor-elect of the city of New York. I come to join with them my tribute and respect to one whom I have known long and have long honored and esteemed as one of my old and time-honored and much beloved friends. You have selected him as the mayor of this great city, not because he is from the state of Ohio; you have selected him for what he is, for what he represents, for what he stands for. He represents in a long business life honest, clean, manly methods, and I am quite sure to the administration of the great office to which he has been so recently chosen he will bring the same clean business, manly methods that have characterized every business connection of his life. I want to assure my associates of the Ohio Society that Ohio is justly proud of the distinction which has been given to one of her early citizens, Colonel Strong, and I wish for him as every Ohioan does, no matter what his political associations may be, a successful administration of the municipal government of the greatest city of the greatest state of the greatest nation under the sun.' Those were the words of the then governor, now our great President, William McKinley. (Applause.) I think the spiritual strength which Colonel Strong has now received both from the bishop and otherwise will enable to respond to the toast of our guest of the evening, Colonel Strong." (Cheers and applause as Colonel Strong arose.)

Colonel Strong said: "Mr. President, our guests, ladies and fellow-members of the Ohio Society: I think I ought not to say anything to you boys to-night. The bishop has given me all the absolution necessary for one evening, and it does not seem fitting hardly for me to make any comment further, but I want to say one thing to the boys here, that I was quite surprised when I was informed by the president of your Society that they intended to pay me this compliment. They came to see me some five or six weeks ago, and I felt then singularly queer that the Ohio Society should think of paying this compliment to me. Three years ago, on a similar occasion, if the banquet given then to me had been at the close of my official career, I should have felt that what I had done in the city of New York would have been endorsed thoroughly by this Society, and I would have then rejoiced that you intended to give me this banquet. Now that I have become a private citizen, and this Society asks me for the second time to be its guest, fills my heart and soul with that thankfulness that words cannot express—a deep feeling of gratitude that I shall always feel towards each member of this Society. There are occasions when the heart is too full for utterance, and this is one of them, notwithstanding the surroundings are so delightful. There are friends to the right of me, friends to the left of me, and hosts of them in front of me, all joyous and happy in the enjoyment of this delicious dinner, served so bountifully by this, the grandest hostelry in the world, the pride of the city of New York, which is to-day the second city in population on the globe, and the peer of London in its educational advantages, and general care of its citizens, whether rich or poor. The position which I have held for three years has brought me in close touch with the great charitable institutions in the city, as well as the city's care of its own poor, and, notwithstanding the large number of people that have been out of employment during the last three or four years in this city, necessitating additional expenditures of money by the authorities, as well as additional drafts on the open-handed charities of this city, yet when we compare the results with London and other large cities of the world, there is no citizen of New York but who can feel proud of the work done. (Applause.)

“The distribution of money by the different departments of the city of New York to the public contractors and for their own work during the last year has averaged about $50,000 per working day, and that has all gone to the laboring classes of the city of New York, and it will ever be a living monument to the different departments of the city government, in my opinion. My own duties in the mayor's office I shall not speak of, only to call your attention to the good work done by the heads of departments in reducing the death rate in the last four years a little over five points. To the improvements in the Correction Department, particularly in tearing down the old Tombs, which has been a menace to the city of New York for the last ten or twelve years, and which has been presented by every grand jury that has met once a year in the last ten or twelve years. To the changes in the Charities Department, making changes in all the buildings on the island used for charitable purposes, and re-creating, nominally, Bellevue Hospital. To the Park Department, for the increase in the number of parks in the congested parts of the city, both on the East and West sides, and the great increase in the public school buildings, sufficient to give every child in the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx a seat. To the Public Works Department, for the additional asphalt pavement in the avenues and side streets, and especially for laying two forty-eight-inch water mains from the Central Park reservoir to the lower end of the city, which will ever be a crowning work of this administration, furnishing from ten to fifteen millions of gallons of water per day below Canal street. To the Dock Department, for the magnificent work started in building piers sufficiently large to take in the largest steamships that float on the Atlantic, and giving us four or five recreation piers on the water fronts, which will be one of the greatest boons to those who are compelled to reside in this city during the hot months of summer. To the good work of the Fire Department, and last, but not least, for the condition of our streets on the 1st of January, 1898, as compared with their condition on the 1st of January, 1895 (applause), and many other extensive enterprises that have been started, such as the new East River bridge and the location of the public library on Reservoir square.

“I am not going to say anything about the Police Department, because that speaks for itself, and has been speaking for the last three years. We have had a jolly time with them, and for the first time I believe in the history of New York city you have had a quiet time for the last three or four months. You have had a chief that even the present administration has selected to continue as chief, and with five thousand police officers belonging to the borough of Manhattan and the Bronx, and two thousand in the other boroughs, a force of seven thousand men, I believe there is no such police force on the face of the earth. All of these different enterprises must be criticised by others. There are some pleasant duties, however, that I have been called upon to indulge in, the visiting of our public schools in their hours of study, and to see the interest the principals and their lady teachers take in their work, interesting each scholar in his or her duty to the city, state and nation, and engendering a spirit of patriotism in the young minds which will probably continue with them through their lives, and I fully believe that the condition of our public schools to-day in the city of New York has no superior in any city of the world. A visit to our many charitable institutions will amply repay any of you who has not had that pleasure, and see for yourselves the manner in which the money that is appropriated to these different institutions is accounted for by them, and among the regrets that I shall carry with me into my private life was the inability to satisfy all the demands made upon me by those who had seen better times and had become impoverished by misfortune and nominally without friends to help them.

“Then again the dark clouds would roll away, and a gallant young couple appear at the desk, anxious to have the marriage ceremony performed, and that, the bishop has said to me, was where I interfered with him, and my reward for the service would be a sweet kiss from the bride. (Laughter.) And then quite often a few of the good ladies of New York would honor me with a visit about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, or half-past 4, when we would take a cup of tea. Some of these young ladies would look up with their bright and smiling faces and say, ‘Mr. Mayor, this is really tea and nothing else.’ (Great laughter.)

“Now, one word about the election of 1894. The platform was business, not politics. I have endeavored to adhere to that pledge. I have not injected politics into any act of mine. I selected gentlemen from all avocations and parties that were in favor of a business administration, and in doing so was quite sure that the real politicians would be dissatisfied with that course, but to me it seemed that I was pledged to just that very thing, and it was a pleasure to me to carry out that pledge. The result of the work is before you, and having retired from the office, and commenced picking up the threads of business again, I take additional pleasure in joining my old friends in the Ohio Society in promoting its interests and its pleasures." (Great applause.)

President Burnett said: "I do not know that there can be better testimony given to the administration of Mayor Strong than that of his predecessor in that office—a very able man and a Democrat—Abram S. Hewitt. We expected him to be with us to-night and he confidently counted on being here, but his health did not permit, and he sends this message: 'I can assure you that I am very grateful to the Ohio Society for the privilege of testifying my respect to my friend, ex-Mayor Strong, whose administration will always be regarded, I think, as the culmination of the effort of many men to introduce better methods into the municipal government of this city. The work actually accomplished is stupendous. The mayor was fortunate in having not only the opportunity but the power to carry his ideas into effect, and his memory will always be identified with the improvements in the streets, the docks, the schools and the charities for which good citizens had long prayed in vain.'

"Companions, we have with us to-night one of Ohio's greatest living sons, the recent attorney-general, Mr. Harmon, and it gives me peculiar pleasure to present him to you."

Judge Harmon said: "Mr. President and Ladies and Gentlemen: When a Buckeye from home is invited to address Buckeyes who have been transplanted—Buckeyes abroad, as it were—he is usually expected, I suppose, to talk about Ohio. Her origin and history do afford many tempting themes. So do the union in her people of the best strains of the human race and her position at the centre of this great commonwealth of states, allied by blood and interest with all sections, but belonging to none. But I have noticed that those are most given to talking about themselves who feel more certain about the past and the future than they do about the present. We can afford to be silent about Ohio. Besides, when fitness compels us to break this silence now and then, though we merely mention a few well-known facts, we are accused of boasting. I have, therefore, chosen another subject. It is historic, but it is not confined between the river and the lake. It may be called pre-historic as to Ohio."

Judge Harmon's address was replete with historic information, regarding the growth of Ohio and the nation, and of the ideas out of which they grew.

President Burnett said: "There is a message and a thought for the sons of Ohio in New York that they may well ponder and patriotically work out. It seems to me a great thought. At our former banquets there appeared from Ohio one who gave us peculiar pleasure, and when this banquet was first suggested, almost unanimously you petitioned your president and the chairman of your banquet committee, Senator Brice, that he should not be omitted. He had touched our hearts; had aroused our enthusiasm to a pitch seldom reached by any speaker. That man is with us again to-night out of his grace and magnanimity, and I present to you one of Ohio's most brilliant sons in that of James H. Hoyt."

Mr. Hoyt said: "Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen: I confess my surprise when listening to the very eloquent address of the bishop of this diocese, who is admired for his eloquence, beloved for his tolerance, and also very highly esteemed because he is able to keep up with the times, that when he was discharging his vicarious functions so gracefully and beautifully he expressed himself as unable to discover where it was that our very esteemed friend, Mr. Strong, got the germs from which the bodily ailment to which he referred came. (Laughter.) I am surprised at this statement on the part of the bishop, and regret that he should have so publicly admitted that he is not quite abreast with the science of the day because, having known that Mr. Strong was interfering with him in his matrimonial business, and competing with him, as he has publicly announced to-night, by simply kissing the bride, the bishop should have known that science tells us that there is very great danger of the worst germs being transmitted to us by the most platonic osculations.

"I sympathize greatly with Mayor Strong to-night. The bishop, when he referred to his vivid English and picturesque vocabulary, put him under a disadvantage. He is on his good behavior to-night. He is somewhat in the situation of the Irish lady who went to the confessional. She went on a Saturday, and having told the father confessor of some few things that she was ready to admit, and concealed from him others which it was perhaps better that she should confine to herself, and having been put to a state of grace by the confessor until the following Tuesday, who informed her that any dereliction from duty would make his absolution, for which she had paid a handsome price, worthless. As she came out of the box she was met by Bridget, with whom she had had considerable trouble in the past. She said to her: 'Mary Maloney, if I had known it was you there, being a hard working girl, I would have brought my work, because I cannot waste the whole day sitting around here while you are concealing from the father what you have done and confessing only a portion of your crimes.' Mary was completely overcome, and replied: 'Bridget, you know I can't talk back to you, for I am in a state of grace, but d—— you, wait till Tuesday next and then I will talk to you.' (Much laughter.)

"If I may be permitted a paradox, there are present here to-night some sturdy Buckeyes whose roots are still firmly embedded in the fertile soil of that favored region in which a bountiful and all-wise Providence first planted the fruitful seed from which we have sprung. We have hitherto resisted all attempts to transplant us. Those of you who at one time grew alongside us and mingled your brilliant foliage with our own, but are now, moved by philanthropic motives, of course, affording grateful shade in other sections, or ornamenting other landscapes, know how eager and insistent the efforts to uproot us must have been and are; for the Æsculus glabra, that is, the fetid, or Ohio, buckeye, is a tree which no community seems well able to get along without. But we have loyally remained where God in his infinite wisdom originally planted us, and where, it is safe to assume, he intended us to stay, since he made us indigenous to the soil. Our tap-roots still suck refreshment from the sleeping waters of the great lake, and of the rolling Ohio, and of the beautiful Muskingum, to say nothing of the rich and varied nutriment they derive from the glacier-like Cuyahoga. To such Buckeyes the occasion we are here celebrating is not one of unmixed joy. To adapt the words of the old song, our spirits have only been kept up by pouring spirits down. Your applause and laughter seem to us somewhat incongruous, if not wholly out of place.

“There are two reasons for our melancholy. In the first place, you may have heard that there is a very high wind prevailing in Ohio just now, and we much fear that some of our most imposing Buckeyes will be uprooted and others somewhat disfigured by it. We have withstood stiff gales before, but this is assuming cyclonic proportions, and I regret very much to say that there are no present signs of its decreasing in violence, either. We are told that cyclones clear the atmosphere and blow away mists; but, unfortunately, they clear the earth also, and blow away more substantial things quite as completely. It is not much consolation to a man who stands among the ruins of his home, with crops destroyed, and buildings demolished, and with fences blown down and John Sherman not by to fix them, to find the sky clear above his head. (Applause.) He would naturally prefer to be covered by his roof, however humble, rather than by the vaulted heavens, however cerulean. He cannot help regretting that his habitation was in the track of the storm at all. He cannot help wishing that the cyclone had stayed out in Kansas, or Illinois, or in Missouri, where they have cyclone cellars and hardier stock, and are better prepared to endure such violent atmospheric disturbances.

“You perhaps remember the story of the Missouri mule, which was bodily carried by a cyclone from one county to another. When the storm struck him he was quietly grazing in one river bottom, and when he was found he was quietly grazing in another. It turned out that he had been carried sidewise; and the editor of the local paper triumphantly announced that ‘Even a cyclone knew better than to fool around the hind legs of a Missouri mule.’ (Laughter.) We are very much afraid that Ohio will not be quite as desirable a place of residence in the immediate future as it has been in the past, for cyclones have an uncomfortable habit of sometimes recurring, and, besides, Ohio is so important a part of the United States, and her interests are so interwoven with the interests of other localities, that it makes all apprehensive that the catastrophe which has smitten us may result in damage to other portions of the country. There is a force or influence, derived from prior character or deeds and an expectation of future accomplishments, based on past achievements, and they both make up a definition of what men call prestige. We are not carrying about as much prestige with us this year as we did last. We are just a little shy of it. Our prior deeds are all right; but our expectations of what our future accomplishments will be are not quite as dazzling as they have been, and so to-night it is a little difficult for us to “ ‘Awake the pert and nimble spirit of mirth.’ ”

“ But that is not all that troubles us to-night. To put it mildly, we are regretfully surprised that the citizens of this metropolis, rich in art, in accumulated capital, in tall buildings, in refinement and in intercepted, not intercepting, sewers, are apparently utterly unable to appreciate and hold on to a really good thing when they have once grasped it. When you have had for your chief executive an Ohioan, and especially such an able, broad-minded, patriotic, obstinate, or, rather, I should say, determined, and non-partisan an Ohioan as the appropriately named Mr. Strong, the fact that you have not seen fit to continue to avail yourselves of his conspicuous services, when you could have retained them, undoubtedly for a very inadequate sum, fills us with a sorrowful chagrin. (Great applause.) Your substitution of the Tulip for the Buckeye startles us.

“ As I have said, under all circumstances, this occasion is not one of un-mixed joy to us Ohioans, and it reminds me of a story of a German gentleman who had the good sense to leave his native Hanover and settle, not only in Ohio, but in the northern part of it. He did this some years ago, however. A few months ago his first wife died, and within three days from the time when he had planted her remains with appropriate ceremonies, and had thus tearfully and sorrowfully done his best to put her in the way of a glorified resurrection, he married again. His friends and neighbors, in order delicately, but unequivocally, to convey to him a distinct impression that his second plunge into the troubled waters of matrimony had been, in their judgment, a trifle premature, surrounded his dwelling on the evening of his wedding day and made the circumambient ether eloquent with emphatic but rather unmusical sounds. The widowed bridegroom, not panoplied for war, rushed from the nuptial chamber out upon the porch and thus addressed them: ‘ These —— noises is shameful. You don’t got any manners at all. You forgot gombletely that it ain’t a week since in this house some one has already died!’ (Laughter.)

“ Up to three years ago I spent the major portion of my leisure time in a diligent but ineffectual search of historic records in order to discover the precise language which General Washington used when he rebuked Lee on the battlefield of Monmouth. There had been sudden and critical emergencies in my experience when I sadly felt the need of a richer, more vigorous and more sonorous vocabulary than a Christian training had permitted me to acquire. I had often found myself in the condition of the Maine farmer, the tailboard of whose cart had been pushed upward by a bad boy at the bottom of a long hill, and who found, when he arrived at the top, that although he still had his wagon with him, his load of potatoes had not accompanied him up the incline. When asked by a friend who happened to come along that way why he did not relieve his pent-up feelings by profanity, he replied, ' My eddication's been so durned limited that I don't know a single cuss word that'll do this here landslide justice.' (Laughter.) I therefore endeavored to find out the exact phraseology which Washington used on that historic occasion, so that I should not in future be hampered by the lack of expressions sufficiently lurid to adequately express my meaning and relieve my feelings when occasion arose, and yet, at the same time, silence the reproaches of those near and dear to me by being able to assure them that I was exactly, not only in spirit, but in word, following the illustrious example of the Father of my Country. All my efforts to thus improve myself were, however, unavailing. But, thanks to the honored guest of this evening, this limitation has been entirely removed during the last three years, for whenever I found it needful or soothing to ornament my speech by the use of virile adjectives I have been able to do so with perfect impunity and satisfaction, and have at once disarmed all hostile criticism by the mere statement, when I have been brought to book, that I was only quoting the words of so eminent and worthy an authority as the great and good Mayor Strong. I feel sure that Mr. Horr had his honor in mind when he said that 'swearing is the unnecessary use of profanity.' I am sure, at any rate, that if his honor, worn out by the impertunity of some unworthy office-seeker, or exasperated by the incompetence of some public official, has ever, as has been reported, let fall a good mouth-filling oath, in his case, as in the case of Uncle Toby, 'The accusing angel, which flew up to heaven's chancery with the oath, blushed as he gave it in; and the recording angel, as he wrote it down, dropped a tear on the word and blotted it out forever.' Mr. Strong no longer occupies his official position, but he will nevertheless not only be still addressed, but always considered by good citizens everywhere, as 'His Honor.' (Cries of "Good.") His administration in one sense is over, but in another very real sense he will still continue to execute the will of the patriotic people of New York. The appointments not only of his immediate but of his remote successors will be better because his in the main have been so good. They will be more efficient in the public service because he was so zealous and earnest. His example will be not only a stimulus but a goad. The fumes of his historic teapot no longer cut the close atmosphere of the mayor's office with their pungent fragrance (laughter), but the simple hospitality he so graciously dispensed, which strengthened his supporters and revived even the drooping spirits of unsus-cessful applicants for his favor, will not soon be forgotten. The curtain has indeed been rung down on the drama, but the recollection of how well the leading actor did his part will be long fresh in the minds of his audience. He has stood for that which is best in American citizenship, for firmness, not for arrogance; for good business, not for mere partisanship; for an energetic and practical honesty, not for sanctimonious pretence; for efficiency, not for glitter, and for the people, not for himself. He has dropped a very large pebble into the ocean of public opinion, and the wave it has made will beat upon far-distant shores." (Great applause.)

President Burnett said: "We who live in New York feel the force of what has just been said. Colonel Strong has 'paced' the machine that is to follow, and the speed must be kept up or that machine will fall out of the race. Those we have known best, the citizens of New York, will not be content with what is less, that which is not so good, and if that high administration, that pure and just government he has given us, is not still with us, then will be aroused in this city and throughout the land a public opinion that will sweep any administration that undertakes to administer the laws of this great city out of power. Tallyrand once said to Napoleon when boasting how strongly he was enthroned, 'There is a power in France more omnipotent than you and all your soldiers, and that is the power of public opinion.' That power is always at work, always thinking, always testing, and unless the measure that Colonel Strong gave us of good government is not maintained, that omnipotent power will sweep any administration into oblivion. In our Ohio Society we have had a teacher. He has undertaken to teach Ohio's sons how to make speeches. He has been at work on our Brother Foyé for a year or two, and he has brought him up to a facility where Bourke Cockran and others of our eloquent speakers grow pale with envy when they hear him. Now he has also been training others, and I want him to tell our friends here, especially the members of the Ohio Society, how he has done it. We want to hear a word from Brother Packard."

Mr. S. S. Packard said: "Mr. President, do I understand that you wish me to claim the credit of our friend's great achievements as a public speaker? I would dislike to do it before this audience. I am a modest man, and while I confess to have had something to do in the matter, I think it would be better to make my claim in private. One thing we will all assent to, viz.: that while our friend was simply President of the Ohio Society we did not know the extent of his oratorical gift. We simply had not drawn it out. But no sooner had he become mayor than we began to know him better; and I state no secret when I say that during the past three years he has attained to great distinction, and is now reckoned among the great orators of the country. So far as my own connection with the matter is concerned I will only say that directly after his nomination I took him in hand. I gave him his first hearing before a West Side Club, and in a year thereafter he appeared before the same club. On the first occasion he foreshadowed his administration, and on the second he gave a wonderfully concise and comprehensive account of his stewardship. Meantime he lost no opportunity to practice his growing gift, at dinners and on public occasions."

Mr. Packard followed at some length, in his usual happy vein.

President Burnett said: "Now that our banquet may be brought to a fitting close, we of this Society and our friends will be glad to hear a word from an old president, whose public spirit has made him in quick sympathy with all things that make for the better order and higher civilization of our city, and that is our former president, General Swayne." (Applause.)

General Swayne said: "Mr. President and Gentlemen: I am reminded by this occasion of a very great service which your now president rendered to the Ohio Society. On the first occasion when it was my duty to preside over one of your annual banquets, when the hour of eleven came and we were having such a good time that we were insensible of the flight of time, a little note from Gen. Burnett was laid at my plate, saying, 'Now is the time to close.' One good turn deserves another, and he will permit me now at this time and on this occasion to return the compliment in the same words. (Laughter.)

"The only thing with which I will detain you with reference to the honored guest whom it is our privilege this night to cherish, is to recall to mind what has occurred to me as I sat at that table and looked into your faces, and as I stand now and contemplate you individually, and that is, what does it mean that this company of old friends and neighbors, this company of men who are assembled here to keep alive not simply the memory of the State of Ohio, but to keep alive in our hearts and in our lives and in this community, the place which the state ought to have; any state in which a man lives and the state in which any man was born ought to have a place in every man's heart, if he is to render back any adequate return in his own life for the blessings which the state has showered upon him.

"This gentlemen, has always been the underlying idea of this Ohio Society. We have been chaffed a good deal for the pleasant things we have said here in these meetings about our state. They have seemed to other people sometimes boastful, even windy, but these people have forgotten that we have not meant to institute a comparison. A man does not need to challenge a comparison between his own mother and the mother of another man, because whatever his own mother may be or may have been, beyond all peradventure, she has been to him the best mother in the world. Now we are gathered here to-night to celebrate the services rendered to this state in its chief city by a native of our state, and they who think that meaning inconsiderable had better follow that excellent custom of sometimes bringing one's own mind up to the discipline of finding out what words mean, by going back to find out what was in the minds of those men, what those men were trying to express who first brought into use the words, 'Our native state.' Think of nature! Think of nativity! Think of nations! Think of all those things and the difference they make in the lives of men. I think it is appropriately laid down in the Scriptures that the Lord shall judge the nations and govern the peoples of the earth.

"Now we are here a Society, organized to keep alive in our own hearts and in our minds the meaning and the blessing of statehood, the fellowship which is due from one to another by reason of that idea, and to celebrate in the person of our own ex-president the blessings which his own administration has met with upon the state. In the exercise of that duty, in the enjoyment of that pleasure, in the halo of that honor, we have gathered to cherish and to honor him, and now this night, in the fullness of all that has been done, celebrating the career that he has closed and welcoming him back to private life, and as you and I trust for many and many a year of increasing honor and enjoyment, we say to him literally and from our hearts, 'Godspeed.'" (Applause.)

The entertainment committee in reporting, at a later date, upon this banquet to the Society, said:

"Gentlemen: It was a fortunate circumstance for the Society (although a great misfortune to Greater New York) that we were enabled this year to make our annual banquet complimentary to our honored fellow-member, ex-Mayor Strong. When the city of New York, three years ago, honored him with an election to its mayoralty, the Society bade him godspeed in a most enthusiastic banquet; and having discharged the duties of his great office with that ability, integrity and fidelity, which command the respect of every good citizen, our Society honored itself by honoring him, at the close of his majority, as at its beginning.

"This banquet was an eminent success from every point of view. The Astor Gallery was never more beautiful or artistic in the arrangement of its tables, in its floral decorations, and the picture here made complete when the sons of Ohio and their guests were seated at small tables to the number of about 225. The souvenir especially designed and gotten up for this occasion is a work of high art and justly called forth enthusiastic commendation. The tinted cover embossed with a branch of the buckeye tree showing the ripened nut in natural colors; the frontispiece with buckeye branches showing leaf, and flower, and fruit so arranged as to enwreath the centre of our beautiful state seal; the full page, half-tone portrait of our honored guest, ex-Mayor Strong, taken from a photograph for which he had sat for our use, and the best picture yet taken of him; and the menu to satisfy the taste of the con-noisseur, with its historic teapot illustration thrown in for the benefit of Colonel Strong, together formed a unique and interesting keepsake. The committee had an extra number of copies struck off, and sent one to each of the non-resident members and resident members who were not at the banquet, and also to the principal papers of Ohio. The numerous responses confirmed the wisdom of the committee in thus distributing these souvenirs. The speaking was of a high order and well up to the Ohio standard. Colonel Strong, Bishop Potter, ex-Attorney-General Judson Harmon of Cincinnati and Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland, were the principal speakers, and their oratory held the close attention of their audience. General Burnett presided with his usual grace and most happily introduced the various speakers. The evidence of good fellowship among all the members and guests was never more apparent, and it is very safe to report that every one present spent a most enjoyable and charming evening.

“Great credit is due to the special committee charged with the duty of arranging the details of the banquet, attending to the printing, sending out the invitations, circulars, etc., and collecting the money for the tickets, and settling all bills. The financial result proved quite satisfactory, since the committee were enabled to turn into the treasury of the Society after all bills had been paid, the handsome sum of $319.14. In conclusion it may well be said that this last banquet of our Society, taken all in all, ranks among the most noted banquets given since the organization. On behalf of the banquet committee.

“WARREN HIGLEY.”

The meeting of February 14th was held at Morelli's. Professor Packard opened the social part of the entertainment with a short address, in which he asserted that it was a characteristic desire of Ohio men always to do the duty which the occasion demanded, and that while we might miss from our meetings some of those choice spirits, whose presence and voices usually animated our proceedings, we should feel that they were still with us in spirit, and under their inspiration we should each perform this duty. He then announced that the duty and the pleasure which would fall to the lot of each diner would be to make a short speech, and supplemented this announcement by the statement that he had obtained the names of each one present, and that he had directed the doors to be barred and no guilty man would escape.

The presiding officer at this point called upon Leander H. Crall to present a matter in which all the members were certain to take more than a passing interest. One of the members of the Society had been called to a high position of honor under the government, and it was thought fitting that the Society should take notice of the fact.

Mr. Crall then read a series of resolutions prepared by Gen. Wager Swayne, which were adopted as follows:

After the adoption of the above resolution the Hon. Mahlon Chance was called upon and responded in a lively vein of reminiscences which elicited much applause from those present. A number of other interesting speeches were then made. When the Society convened on April 11th Colonel Strong moved that the following telegram be transmitted by the Society to the President of the United States, Executive Mansion, Washington: "The Ohio Society of New York, at a regular meeting now in session, unanimously endorses and heartily approves your noble and patriotic message sent to Congress of the United States this day." The Society adjourned to enjoy an entertainment provided by the entertainment committee, by the College Graduates' Glee Club.

CHAPTER XIV

ALADIES' reception and dance was given at the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of April 20th. It was in charge of the following gentlemen and ladies: Entertainment committee, Warren Higley, chairman; David Homer Bates, Jr., P. Bradlee Strong, William H. Caldwell, Noah H. Swayne 2d. Reception committee, Thomas H. Wheeler, chairman; Henry B. Wilson, George E. Armstrong, Frank C. Loveland, Cary W. Moore, Mahlon Chance, William Ford Upson, Harry C. Grant, R. C. Penfield, William H. Brown, David H. Bates, Samuel Thomas, De Frees Critten, P. F. Collier, Evarts L. Prentiss, James G. Newcomb, C. C. Shayne, Arthur S. Hayes, Andrew J. C. Foyé. Floor committee, Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; David Homer Bates, Stewart M. Brice, Emmett B. Wheeler, Howard Elmer Crall, Peter H. Burnett, P. Bradlee Strong, Henry B. C. Plimpton, Elijah G. Boardman. The following ladies served as hostesses: Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. William L. Strong, Mrs. Calvin S. Brice, Mrs. Silas S. Packard, Mrs. Milton I. Southard, Mrs. Thomas Ewing, Mrs. Wager Swayne, Mrs. Wallace C. Andrews, Mrs. Andrew J. C. Foyé, Mrs. Algernon S. Sullivan, Mrs. Bernard Peters. There was a large attendance and the evening was a great success.

At the meeting of May 9th a report was received from the house committee as to the progress made in furnishing and fitting up the new rooms at the Waldorf-Astoria. In answer to a question, Judge Higley made a statement as to the privileges of the members in the hotel.

The meeting of the Society on June 13th, was the first held in the new quarters at the Waldorf-Astoria. The president appointed the following-named gentlemen as a committee to consider changes in the constitution, respecting membership, pursuant to action taken by the Society at the last meeting: Wager Swayne, William L. Strong, Leander H. Crall, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Milton I. Southard.

The formal business having been disposed of, the president expressed the pleasure of the Society on account of the presence at the meeting of an esteemed ex-president, General Wager Swayne, and invited that gentleman to address the meeting. General Swayne responded in an entertaining and enlightening address, in which he declared the true object of the Society to be, not the glorification of the achievements of its distinguished citizens, but rather the perpetuation of the idea of the state and the fostering of those principles upon which the state had been founded, and which had guided and characterized the conduct of the state in national crises. After General Swayne had spoken, the chairman of the entertainment committee, Judge Higley, announced that a collation would be served at the roof garden of the building, and the Society thereupon adjourned to that place.

A special meeting of the Ohio Society was held at the office of the president, on October 28, 1898, to take action on the death of Vice-President Silas S. Packard, who had died on the previous day. A committee were appointed to prepare resolutions on the death of Mr. Packard, who was one of the most influential members of the organization. At the annual meeting, on November 29th, this committee presented a report which was read by General Swayne, as follows:

“Silas S. Packard was one of the earlier members of this Society. From the beginning of his membership to the end of his life the Society enjoyed his constant interest and held high place in his affection. How much that means is best seen by a glance at the manifold objects of its interests and affection which claimed him as their own; his family, rejoicing in his loving heart and true and tender life; his friends, who found their own place second only to his family's in his heart and life; his church and his pastor, in whom he found good anchorage for his hope for this life and for the glory yet to be revealed; his pupils, who found in him teaching that instructed the whole character and stimulated in them every aspect of a valuable life; his alumni, who found in after years that to formally organize and cherish a Packard Alumni Association was but another name for renewing and preserving everything in them that was worth keeping; his city, state and country, each in its degree, having its proper exaltation in his heart and life. These show the man who has been one of us, and who was glad and proud to be such, and to make his membership a real one to such an extent that for his part we were members each of one another.

“Mention of all these discloses not merely what he was to the Society or the Society to him; they go beyond that and disclose the man. He began life for himself, seeking for light. With his shoes slung across his shoulders he trudged his way barefoot from his boyhood home to the Academy at Granville, sparing not his feet if only he might when among men be decent in appearance.

“His first choice of a life work was portrait painting, but the insight that comes of a sympathy soon taught him that he was more fit to mold the plastic lineaments of heart and life in youth than he was fit for copying with a brush the features of men's faces.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Having found his right field, he labored in it till he died. It was not given him to round off his career; that better thing was given him: to build it up with full dimensions to the top. He died in the performance of his full day's work. If the diminished strength of later years caused anything to fall away, it was only as leaves may fall and leave the trunk and branches unimpaired. Nothing was lost, for the result was that on meeting him and looking up, we saw not foliage, but the sky; he became more and more not merely useful, but also an inspiration.

“His pupils are his monument, but his friends as a wreath carved on a monument, may add what serves to heighten its expression. We therefore join with his family, his pupils, and his friends in cutting deep this epitaph: ‘The Teachers Shall Shine as the Firmament; And They That Turn Many to Righteousness. as the Stars Forever and Ever.’

“Resolved, That a copy of this minute be engrossed and sent to Mrs. Packard with the Society's expression of personal regard.”

The memorial received instant and emphatic approval and a motion was made by Mr. Chance for its adoption by a rising vote. The motion was unanimously carried.

At the meeting of November 14th the nominating committee, chosen in October and composed of the following gentlemen: D. H. Bates, L. D. Morrison, Colgate Hoyt, H. B. C. Plimpton, Chas. W. Morris, Ralph W. Carroll, Noah Swayne 2d, reported the following ticket for the action of the Society at its annual meeting: President, Milton I. Southard; vice-presidents, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Augustus D. Juilliard, Geo. E. Armstrong, Thomas H. Wheeler, Warren Higley; secretary, William H. Blymer; recording secretary, Walter S. Sullivan; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, Louis D. Clarke, Abner McKinley, Peter F. Collier.

Mahlon Chance addressed the Society, devoting his remarks chiefly to reminiscences of Mr. Packard. He paid an eloquent and glowing tribute to the love he bore to the Society and to his high character and worth.

The annual meeting was held at Morelli's, where dinner was served, on November 29th. Judge Higley, chairman of the governing committee, presented the annual report. One ballot was cast, and the officers proposed at the last meeting were unanimously elected. General Burnett then arose, and after expressing his high appreciation of the honors he had received at the hands of the Society, and promising in the future his loyal support in its ranks, introduced the president-elect, Hon. Milton I. Southard, and at the same time transferred to him the badge of office. Mr. Southard responded with a brief address, thanking the Society for the honor which had come to him, unexpected and unsought, and pledged his earnest efforts to maintain the past high record of the organization.

HON. MILTON I. SOUTHARD

President from November 29, 1898, to November 29, 1901

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

A letter was read by General Burnett from Capt. John T. Granger, presenting to the Society a handsome silk banner, a souvenir of the Harrison and Tyler hard-cider campaign. General Swayne exhibited the souvenir to those present and moved its acceptance by the Society. In making the motion he gave a most entertaining description of the campaign of 1840 and of the origin of the name "Buckeye" as applied to residents of Ohio, stating that he had discovered that the use of that name dated from the hard-cider campaign of 1840. The speaker, proceeding, declared it to be his belief that one of the chief purposes of the Society should be to perpetuate the idea of the state, not of our state in particular, but of The State, or rather the principle and origin of statehood.

Upon motion of Judge Higley the thanks of the Society were extended to Capt. Granger for the unique gift; and Judge Higley further moved that the governing committee have the banner suitably framed and hung in the rooms.

A call was made for a speech from Mahlon Chance, and that gentleman responded in a most patriotic and eloquent tribute to the moral virtues and prowess of the American Eagle.

In December Colgate Hoyt was unanimously elected chairman of the governing committee. On the 12th of the month, at a meeting of the Society, President Southard named the following committees, to serve during the coming year: Literature and art, J. Q. A. Ward, Franklin Tuttle, Dan C. Beard, Louis H. Severance, S. H. Parsons; entertainment. Warren Higley, David H. Bates, Jr., Peter H. Burnett, Noah H. Swayne 2d, Andrew Ernest Foyé; library, P. F. Collier, R. J. Chard, Elijah G. Boardman, W. H. Jennings, Hamilton Busbey; auditing, H. A. Glassford, Henry L. Carr, J. H. Hewson, C. C. Shayne, James G. Newcomb.

Mr. Crall read an editorial from a Cincinnati paper, dealing with the question of the date of Ohio's admission to the Union. An interesting discussion followed, in which Mr. Chance, Mr. Crall and President Southard took part. The Society invited Mr. Chance to read a paper at the next meeting, setting forth the arguments in favor of November 29, 1802, as the date of Ohio's admission to the Union. Mr. Chance announced that a Maryland Society was being formed in an adjoining room, with purposes and aims similar to those of the Ohio Society, and suggested the appropriateness of the Ohio Society sending greetings and good wishes for the prosperous and useful career to the new Society. Mr. Chance was appointed by the chair to convey to the Maryland Society the fraternal greeting and good wishes of the Ohio Society.

A special meeting was called on December 16th at the office of General

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Swayne, to take action relative to the death of the Hon. Calvin S. Brice. A committee were appointed to prepare resolutions.

Vice-President Foyé, at the meeting of February 9, 1899, made a report as to the progress of the banquet committee, expressing the hope that the Society would have the President of the United States present as its guest, at the coming annual banquet, and stated that President Southard and Colonel Strong were then in Washington for the purpose of consulting the President's convenience as to date, etc. At this point President Southard appeared, having just arrived from Washington, and reported the regrettable fact that the President, on account of the approaching close of Congress, and the unusual importance of the measures to be presented to him, had reached the conclusion that it would be impossible for him to attend the banquet this year, but that another year he hoped to have the pleasure of being present with the Society.

The thirteenth annual banquet of the Society was held in the grand banquet hall of the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of Saturday, February 25, 1899. The gentlemen here named served as the banquet committee: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; William L. Strong, William L. Brown, Samuel Thomas, Abner McKinley, Leander H. Crall, George E. Armstrong, Warren Higley, Louis H. Severance, Peter F. Collier, Louis D. Clarke, H. B. Brundrett, Richard J. Chard, Wager Swayne, Anson G. McCook, Colgate Hoyt, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H. Wheeler, David Homer Bates, John J. McCook, J. Q. A. Ward, Thomas Ewing, Jr., C. C. Shayne, H. B. C. Plimpton, Evarts L. Prentiss. The following gentlemen constituted the reception committee: Henry B. Wilson, chairman; William S. Hawk, James G. Newcomb, Samuel H. Parsons, Rollin M. Morgan, Lowell M. Palmer, Charles F. Dean, L. A. Williams, L. D. Morrison, George P. Tangeman, William Ford Upson, Frank D. Pavey, Frederick C. Train, Francis B. Stedman, David Homer Bates, Jr., Francis B. Swayne, Homer Lee, H. H. Brockway, Charles A. Clegg, Charles S. Hayes, P. S. Jennings.

In view of the fact that William R. Day, president of the Peace Commission, and Whitelaw Reid, a member of the commission, were Ohioans, the usual annual dinner was turned into a banquet in honor of the American Peace Commissioners. It was, as all declared, the most brilliant event in the history of the Society up to that date.

Nearly 300 members and guests met in the banquet hall. National colors decorated the walls and American Beauty roses were strewn lavishly over all the tables. Two of the peace commissioners and the commission's secretary sat at the head table with Gen. Wesley Merritt. The governor of Ohio was also present; his military aids, glittering in gold braid, sat by the side of the victor in the Far East. In the galleries, which were draped in evergreen vines and roses, sat more than a hundred women, who added brilliancy to the scene and sparkle to the wit of the speakers.

But the distinctive achievement of the banquet was the fact that the diplomatic silence which has sealed the lips of the peace commissioners ever since those eventful days in Paris was broken and the position assumed by the United States made open and clear. This was done by the speeches of Senator Gray of Delaware, a Democrat, who declared that in this juncture "we are all Republicans," and of Whitelaw Reid, who was equally frank in his references to the work of the commission and its results. The straightforward declaration of Senator Gray, that "we have got the Philippines, and have got them bad," was vehemently cheered by all present.

General Merritt was conspicuous in his civilian dress. Nothing indicated his high military rank, which was accentuated, however, by the glare and glitter of gold braid all about him.

The banquet was a little late in starting. It was nearly 8 o'clock before the members and their guests were seated. At the principal table sat the president of the Society, Hon. Milton I. Southard, and the following guests: Senator George Gray, Whitelaw Reid, Major Gen. Wesley Merritt, Gov. Asa S. Bushnell, William R. Harper, ex-Gov. James E. Campbell, John B. Moore, secretary of the peace commission; Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. William P. Orr, Gen. J. E. Lowes, Col. Charles B. Wing, Col. Julius Flischman, Col. W. L. Holmes, Col. Robert C. McKinney, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, Col. C. E. Burke, Gen. J. Kent Hamilton, Gen. H. B. Kingsley, Charles F. James, and C. L. Kurtz.

There were absent, however, several prominent men whom the Society was especially desirous of having at this banquet. These were William R. Day, president of the peace commission; Senator Frye, a member of the commission, and Senator Marcus A. Hanna. Not one of these could be present, but sent regrets.

As soon as the dinner was over President Southard, who acted as toastmaster, made the introductory address. He said:

"Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: This is our thirteenth annual banquet, and on behalf of the Society I bid you and our guests, each and all, a sincere and hearty welcome. I salute the ladies in the galleries and would embrace them also—in my welcome. (Laughter, in which the ladies heartily joined.) Once in each recurring year we are accustomed to meet around the festal board, to interchange personal greetings, to 'eat, drink and be merry,' and, last but not least, to be entertained by addresses from our distinguished guests.

"Every now and then at these dinners we have taken it into our heads to suggest an available candidate for president or vice-president of the United States, and the suggestion is usually equivalent to a nomination and election. The choice is apt to be of a native or citizen of Ohio, and if the candidate, like McKinley, happens to be a member of this Society, the objection is promptly waived. We flatter ourselves that McKinley reached the chief executive chair through the portals of this Society. (Laughter and applause.)

“We do not limit the choice, however, to the sons of Ohio. We are too generous for that, and too mindful also of the eminent qualifications of the distinguished sons of other states. What we wish to impress and make clear is this: that the skies of our banquet are surcharged with presidential lightning and it is likely to strike a tall statesman at any time.

“Celebrated as Ohio’s sons are for learning, virtue and courage, their chief characteristic is yet to be named. It is meekness. Mr. McKelway, the brilliant editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, who is celebrated for his far-reaching discernment, divined and proclaimed this truth a few years ago at one of our banquets. And he then drew some deductions from this rare trait of character, and also made a prophecy. He said: ‘The meek shall inherit the earth.’ And behold, straightway McKinley stepped from the governorship of Ohio to the presidential chair. And as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, on behalf of the nation, he forthwith took possession of Cuba and Porto Rico, the fairest flowers of the Antilles, and the far-off Philippines, brightest gems of the Pacific. One more stride like that and our dominions will encircle the globe and the prophecy be fulfilled.

“But, seriously, the achievements of the last year read more like dreams of romance than the chronicles of reality. Who could have foretold the wide eventualities of the Spanish-American war? And who can now predict the future consequences upon the nation and upon the world? A year ago, in December, friendly interchanges of relations took place between Spain and the United States, but the cruel war in Cuba went on; in February came the destruction of the Maine and the loss of 266 of our gallant and patriotic sailors; a few weeks of self-restraint and suppressed anger and then the declaration of war. Within less than four months after, the military and naval power of Spain had been hopelessly crushed, and the brilliancy of the achievements of our army and navy had startled the nations of the world and made them realize as they had never done before the matchless power of the great Republic of the West. Our countrymen, too, were filled with military ardor and high civic pride.

“But a new duty now devolves upon the nation, a duty fraught with many difficulties. Just how it shall best be discharged is yet to be determined. The obligation to make provision for the government of these newly acquired possessions devolves upon Congress, and its members have before them the great charters of our liberties and the lessons and blessings of freedom to guide them. Let us hope and trust that the outcome may be one that will redound to the welfare of our people and to the perpetuity and glory of the nation as the world's great exemplar of freedom and right.

“On the signing of the protocol and the cessation of hostilities the work was not yet done. A definitive treaty of peace must be concluded. The President appointed a commission of five eminent statesmen to perform that difficult and delicate task. Their labors have been completed, and the result ratified by the Senate, and, no doubt, will soon meet with the sanction of the Cortes, and thus become permanently operative upon the two countries.

“Our banquet is given in honor of these high commissioners, and we hope during the evening to hear of all their diplomatic experiences. Now that the Senate has acted upon the treaty, may I not say to our distinguished guests as did the ancient Greek to the Trojans: ‘Lawful be it to sparkle in the air their secrets all.’”

When Mr. Southard proposed the health of President McKinley it was drunk standing, amid cheers, the band striking up “The Star Spangled Banner.”

When Mr. Southard introduced Senator Gray the first great outburst of enthusiasm took place. The applause did not subside until after ex-Mayor Strong had proposed three cheers for the senator and they had been given with a will. Senator Gray spoke at some length to close attention and frequent and loud applause. His statement of his views as to the duty of the hour in the Philippines was regarded as extremely significant, and his utterances were warmly welcomed. He said:

“Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: I can only thank you for this cordial welcome, and say how hard your president has made it for me to speak, after his compliment so undeserved and so laudatory. I could best attest my respect for the Ohio Society in New York and my eager desire to be with you on this occasion by coming at some inconvenience and at some threatened neglect of public duties, somewhat suddenly and on somewhat short notice, in order that I might participate with you in this magnificent banquet.

“Mr. President, you ought to be very proud of their Society, citizens by birth of Ohio, here on the seaboard, and in this great metropolis of New York, so strong in numbers and in intellect and in character. We feel—those of us who have not that privilege, those of us born outside the sacred pale of Ohio, that it is a privilege that does not often come, and that must be appreciated when it does come, to be your guests. When I look over this assembly of Ohioans and recollect the history of that great central state of our Union, I know that you feel, as I have just said, a just pride in your nativity and in the state to which you all owe the allegiance of birth.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“But there is another thought that comes with this, that while you are Ohioans and while you have done so much to illustrate all that is best in American history and in American statesmanship, I also belong to your company by virtue of the fact that I and you, too, are American citizens (applause), and by that high title I claim to be at home among you to-night. There is something very grateful to me always in an occasion like this that is distinctively one springing from state pride and from that love of self-government that belongs to our states, something that illustrates to my mind the strength of our institutions. Stretching from ocean to ocean as a nation, we yet preserve our loyalty to the communities that we govern and to which we belong, and that must preserve in the future, as it has preserved in the past, the true glory of American institutions. I am always thankful that the map of this great country is not painted over with one color; that the states in every map appear distinctively as self-governed sovereign states, and that from them up to the pinnacle of national greatness come the springs of our greatness and the source of all that we hope for as the strength of our future.

“You have just cause to be proud, my fellow-citizens from Ohio, in the occasion on which you are assembled to-night, and I can speak to-night without any suspicion or imputation of self-glorification, because it is for me to bear witness to you to the important part that Ohio has performed in the great concluding act of this drama of the war with Spain. It is a very great honor, my friends, that not only did you contribute your citizen soldiery to the defense of our great Republic, but that you also contributed the character and the statesmanship and that broad-minded judgment in the persons of two who on that peace commission appointed by the President, also from Ohio, have brought to a conclusion the war with Spain by a definitive treaty of peace. And let me say—because it is a pleasure for me to say it in his absence—that no state in this Union could have contributed to that function, or any other great diplomatic function of statecraft, a mind and a character more equipoised, settled, clear and strong than was contributed by Ohio when she sent that quiet, sensible, strong statesman, William R. Day, to Paris to conclude the treaty of peace. Always self-contained, never self-exploitative, always self-suppressed, yet firm and courageous in the performance of duty as he saw it, he has illustrated the very highest traits of American statesmanship and American character in the work that we brought home with us from the other side of the ocean.

“I speak of him first because he was the president of the commission appointed by the President. But Ohio's honors did not cease there. He was ably seconded by another son of Ohio, who, with untiring zeal and devotion to his country's interests as he saw them, with the patriotic and single purpose to achieve and promote the glory and honor and safety of his country—your distinguished fellow-statesman, the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, who sits at my left—has secured for himself a place in the galaxy of American statesmen that must ever remain an honor to him and to the great state that gave him birth.

“And now, my friends, your president has said that he hoped to hear all the diplomatic secrets with which we were supposed to be surcharged, and that we were to display to-night to you something that would gratify your curiosity and your patriotism by telling you of things that happened, that you have a right to know, in those negotiations which we considered so important and which form such an epoch in the history of our country. Well, our great secret is, that we have no secret to disclose. Our conduct there was in unison and in line with American traditions of diplomacy. We knew nothing of intrigue or finesse, but we sought to meet the trained diplomacy of Europe by straightforward and direct methods of American statesmanship and American character. (Cries of ‘You did it, too!’)

“We were far away, and we felt that we five men—felt it with an intensity that I cannot describe adequately—represented our country and its interests, its future, and in a measure its destiny, and whatever differences we had in our own council chamber, and we had many, there was but a solid and single commission when we were opposed to the enemies of our country. We recollected that whatever our differences of opinion might be, when we came to deal with the great interests of the United States as opposed to those of Spain, that political opinion sank into insignificance before the great paramount consideration that we were Americans charged with responsibility for America, charged with a duty to our country, which we endeavored humbly in the sight of God to perform.

“There may have been some questions as to the policy of acquiring the Philippines at all; there may have been grave doubts as to whether we should go outside of the declaration with which the war was commenced and confined, and extend our view outside of this hemisphere to the distant Orient; but there came a time in the course of those negotiations—and this, perhaps, is one of the secrets to which your president alluded—when after four or five weeks of doubt and anxiety it became apparent that these negotiations must either be broken off and your commissioners return without a treaty at all, and that we would be relegated to the necessity of taking not only the Philippines, but Cuba and Porto Rico, by the ruthless hand of military conquest, or by some concessions that comported with the magnanimity and greatness and character of this country; gain them by the voluntary cession of a treaty of peace. And, therefore, we believed that it was better for this country, strong in the hours of its victories, great in the hour of its triumphs, that it should to a beaten and prostrate foe exhibit that magnanimity of which I spoke, and take from them by voluntary cession and by purchase, so to speak, those distant islands rather than to expose ourselves in the eyes of the world to the playing of a rôle of barbaric conquest, and by military power treading the path of mediæval rapine and warfare.

“I speak as one, as my friend on my left and colleague on the late commission will bear me witness, who was reluctant to enter this rôle that we are now playing. I speak as one who shared perhaps the most conservative views on this question that anywhere are expressed in this broad land of ours; but when I find that those who now are or lately have been opposed to the ratification of the treaty at all, all with one voice and one accord, from Senator Hoar down through the ranks of the opposition, declare that whatever might betide us, we must drive out Spain from the Philippine Islands and keep her out, then there was but one plain path of duty before those who thought as I did, and I could form no other opinion then, as I have no other opinion now, than that it was our duty to take those islands and hold them in trust for the great purposes of American freedom and American liberty, guided by all of our history that lies behind us, and moving forward to a goal that must bring happiness, with law and liberty, to peoples who never before had known what they meant.

“How idle, in view of the opinion thus formed, must seem the criticisms of those who are invoking the Declaration of Independence and the time-honored maxims to which we all adhere, that all just government rests on the consent of the governed! Why, don't we know that, after all, the achievement of liberty, ordered and governed by law, is a practical thing and not a thing of phrases? Don't we know that it would be absolutely impossible that those people who for 400 years had known no government but that of Spain, who had no realization of civilization except what had been filtered down through the oppressions of a conquering race? Don't we know that it was impossible for them to conceive, much less achieve, the notion of American liberty until the strong hand of American power had established the law and the order which would give place and opportunity for the blessings that are spoken of when we so apostrophize the Declaration of Independence and liberty?

“Now, another thing and you will pardon me, because this is becoming a very practical question, and fills all our hearts and minds, I know, with anxiety and with thoughtfulness in regard to the future—we are thinking about it, and talking about it in our homes and in our offices and places of business—I want to call your attention to this fact and to this consideration: After the signing of the protocol, on August 12 last, by which an armistice and truce were brought about between Spain and the United States, Manila, its harbors and bay, were occupied by the forces of the United States, and General Merritt, commanding the force and gallant army then in those waters, landed and proceeded to hold in strict obedience to the terms of that protocol that city, with his colleague, Admiral Dewey.

“Spain’s power had been broken; her fleets had been destroyed; her army had been surrendered, and there we stood, the guardians of those people that we had just rescued from the despotism of four hundred years. There we stood, with our flag and our soldiery and our sailors, as the guarantee of American honor and American liberty to those poor people. And now what was to happen? And what has occurred? Before the armistice is over, without a single departure from the strict obligation imposed upon the United States and its armies by that armistice, before the treaty of peace was ratified, and while we stood there with arms at rest guarding those people, having driven out their oppressors, waiting for the definitive ratification of the treaty with their enemy and ours, they exhibited their idea of liberty, their idea of obligation, by attacking without provocation the army that had come to deliver them and the fleet that had co-operated with it and brought about the conflict which is now, unhappily, being waged in those distant islands.

“What have we got to say about the Declaration of Independence? Are we to stop while our soldiers are being shot down and our sailors staining the decks of American men-of-war with their blood, and preach to them the Declaration of Independence, and the saying of Thomas Jefferson, that all just government rests on the consent of the governed? Let us have, at least, opportunity—and we say it in the presence of the world which is to pass upon our conduct, and we invoke the public opinion of the civilized nations of the earth as to the justice of our position—let us have at least the opportunity to show those people what we meant and what we intended, before we commence to talk to them about government resting upon the consent of the governed.

“What analogy is there between their position and ours in the Revolutionary War? I have heard it over and over again on the floor of Congress and in the Senate of the United States, with vociferous iteration, asserted that they had as much justification in taking up arms and shooting down American citizens and American soldiers as had the patriots of ’76 in resisting the forces of King George. Why, for 150 years prior to the Revolution of ’76 we had lived under English government, had protested against its injustice, had formulated our grievances, and had petitioned for their rectification and adjustment, and then only went to arms when all others means failed. Men of their own race, men as capable of self-government as the governing power itself. And here are a people who never knew self-government, who have groaned under Spanish oppression in all these centuries; and for the first time in all their history they have had a gleam of light brought to them by the flag carried by Merritt and Dewey. And yet they are compared to the patriot who in '76 were driven to arms against King George and his forces on the continent of America. It is absurd, and it is stuff and nonsense to talk about there being any kind of comparison between the two historic epochs. I want, as much as any one, to illustrate American character and American principles wherever the American flag floats; but give us the opportunity, and stop shooting American soldiers and American sailors, and we will tell you then what we will do.

“Then what are we to do now? To-night, in the face of this great crisis, for such it is, we are all Democrats and we are all Republicans, and, more than all, we are all Americans. Let us see to it that what we have undertaken in the sight of the world is carried out, and let us not turn our backs upon a duty that is so plain that no man can mistake it. Let us tell these poor people that we have come to give them the liberty they are fighting for, and which they can never attain except with our aid. Why, we were their allies, and they have shed our blood. And yet, with it all, I bespeak for them a patient and long-suffering consideration that is becoming the greatness and the power and the precepts of the great nation to which we belong. We will give them better government than they have ever dreamed of having. We will give them liberty governed by law, and we will do it at all costs and at all hazards, and we will not go back on American manhood and American citizenship and the principles of American liberty in doing it.

“We cannot retreat. We cannot sail away from those islands now. However we might have done so in October or November, we cannot do it in February, in the year of our Lord, eighteen ninety-nine. And so, my friends, we are here to-night, considering for a moment on this festal occasion these grave duties and these grave responsibilities that belong to this great nation of ours, and to its citizenship and to every individual citizen among us.

“Thank God that no American hand ever wielded a sword or pointed a gun that behind that hand there was not an American conscience. Thank God that every American conscience is awakened, and that this matter is debated at every crossroad in this great land of ours, and that when America makes up her mind and has debated and has satisfied herself that her cause is just, then nothing can impede her way or stop her progress in achieving the results at which she aims.

“We did not go to war until the American conscience was awakened. We bore and forbore for many long years a condition of affairs in the neighboring islands of Cuba and Porto Rico that had become abhorrent to the sense of American justice and to American humanity. And it was only after all that, until the great provocation of the loss of our battle-ship Maine and the sacrifice of 266 gallant American sailors, that at last the indignation of this country was aroused and we declared that housekeeping so outrageous should not exist right next door to us.

“My friends, we all owe a duty to our neighbors, and I always liken the situation of our country in this matter of Cuba and the difficulties in Cuba to that of a law-abiding citizen living in one of our civilized and orderly American communities. Because, not only are the citizens law-abiding, but this country is law-abiding, and when that law-abiding citizen finds right next door to him there is an ill-governed, ill-regulated household—the head of the house beating his wife and starving his children—he bears it day after day, because he is a law-abiding citizen, until at last the outcry becomes so great and the outrage so enormous that he can bear it no longer, and he goes in and takes his neighbor by the throat and says: ‘This thing must stop!’ and he does it because he is his neighbor.

“And that was our attitude in the war with Spain. But war was declared, and no one can tell what the consequences of war, once entered upon, are to be. It may set the whole world aflame. But if we went into it righteously, if we went into it with an awakened conscience, if we went into it with a justification that satisfied the moral sense of the American people, then, come what may, as American citizens and as American men, we will face them, whatever they may be.

“And now, my friends, this is not the time to talk to the Philippines, or to give promises to the world as to what we are going to do with these people after we have established orderly government among them. We cannot do it while the crack of Mauser rifles is ringing in our ears. We must, because we believe we have the right, put down this opposition and this destructive attack that is being made upon our country and upon its arms and navies in those distant waters. We cannot reason with those people now. It is not now to preach to them the eternal doctrines of liberty and of freedom, or to read to them the Declaration of Independence. We will do that by and by. I grant you that the situation is serious. I grant you that the difficulties on the path we are treading seem to me very great indeed; but because duty is difficult and dangerous even, it cannot be avoided or evaded by many men. We must face our duties and look them squarely in the face. We have got those islands, and we have got them bad, and we are going to live through it, and, with or without foreign interference, we will so regulate, I confidently believe, our conduct as that we will give no just cause of offence to any power, people or potentate in the world; and, so doing, we may let the consequences take care of themselves.

“Now, that is the way I feel about it, as perhaps the most conservative and the most loth of all the citizens of this country—I won’t say of all the members of the commission—to have anything to do with the Philippines at all. But if, as the opponents of the ratification of the treaty said, and as I said before, we must drive out Spain, then, surely, having driven her out, we cannot leave those islands derelicts on the wide Pacific ocean, to be picked up by any aggressive, grabbing European power that chooses some fine morning to sail by and plant its flag there.

“There is one thing certain, that however unwise it may be said our conduct has been, and however deleterious to our best interests it may have been, it can bring nothing and has brought nothing to the people of those islands but blessing and the promise of blessing such as they never had the opportunity to hope for in all the centuries that have passed.

“We know we are doing them no wrong. We know that they are better for all that has happened, and for all that will happen; and, if it costs us priceless blood and untold treasure, then it is a sacrifice that high civilization owes to inferior civilization, and we will lift them up at any cost and give them an opportunity for that self-government about which we hear so much. Never in all their history has that opportunity come for those people before. Whether they are capable of it or not, I do not know. If they are not capable of it, then we must remain there long enough to illustrate American power and American manhood and American statesmanship.

“When we are convinced that they are capable of it, in God’s name hand them over the islands and let them govern the islands themselves!

“But we have not only driven out Spain, their oppressor, but we intend to drive out anarchy and barbarism and the half-civilization that is now so destructive to American soldiers and American sailors in those islands. We are going to deliver them from themselves and give them some measurable degree of decent white man’s government.

“Now, these are not secrets of diplomacy. Thank God! American diplomacy includes the whole citizenship of seventy millions of people, and their secrets are the secrets of all. As I said before, there can be no settled policy toward these islands adopted by the government of the United States that does not meet the approval of the thoughtful, liberty-loving, God-fearing people of this country. It will be debated, as I said before, at every crossroads, and in every schoolhouse, and a judgment will be formed which in action will be as irresistible as an avalanche in Alpine mountains, and it cannot be evaded, and it cannot be escaped from.

“I believe that in the present crisis—for it is a crisis—that we should act as we acted in the war with Spain. We should relegate our political differences until such time as we may, without a sacrifice of American manhood, consider them. I believe that we should with one voice and one mind stand together, shoulder to shoulder, until tranquillity and peace are restored in the Orient, and then we will talk about the Declaration of Independence, and then we will preach the principles of American liberty, and, God helping us, we will achieve for the world and for civilization a triumph greater than has ever been achieved in all the ages that have preceded us.

“So acting, not giving up our ideals by any means—for no country can afford to trample upon its ideals—but always mindful of them, we will go ahead on the path that duty marks out for us, and, if needs be, we will put those people in possession of the land that they inhabit and leave them to govern it, if we can leave them safely to our interests to do so and to the interests of themselves. By so doing we will achieve a triumph for American civilization and for American traditions more valuable to us than all the islands of the seas.

“Now, apologizing for having detained you so long, if an apology is necessary—(cries of ‘No, no!’)—You are very kind in encouraging me to go on; but my apology must be that I know that this matter now is on your hearts and mind, as it is on my heart and mind, and it will continue to be on our hearts and minds until a settlement consistent with American honor and with American glory and with American conscience and morality is achieved in all parts of the world.”

Whitelaw Reid was welcomed with a repetition of the cordiality manifested when his fellow-commissioner arose to speak. He said:

“You call and I obey. Any call from Ohio, wherever it finds you, is at once a distinction and a duty. But it would be easier to-night and more natural for me to remain silent. I am one of yourselves, the givers of the feast, and the occasion belongs peculiarly to my colleagues on the Peace Commission. I regret that more of them are not here to tell you in person how profoundly we all appreciate the compliment you pay us. Judge Day, after an experience and strain the like of which few Americans of this generation have so suddenly and so successfully met, is seeking to regain his strength at the South. Senator Frye, at the close of an anxious session, finds his responsible duties in Washington too exacting to permit even a day’s absence; and Senator Davis, who could not leave the care of the treaty to visit his state even when his own reelection was pending, has snatched the first moment of relief since he was sent to Paris, last summer, to go out to St. Paul and meet the constituents who have in his absence renewed to him the crown of a good and faithful servant.

“It is all the more fortunate, therefore, that you are honored by the presence of the patriotic member of the opposition who formed the regulator and balance-wheel of the commission. When Senator Gray objected, we all re-examined the processes of our reasoning. When he assented, we knew we were on solid ground and went ahead. It was an expected gratification to have with you also the accomplished secretary and counsel to the commission, a man as modest and unobtrusive as its president, and like him equal to any summons.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

In his regretted absence, we rejoice to have with us the most distinguished military aid ordered to report to the commission, and the most important witness before it—the Conqueror of Manila.

“So much you will permit me to say in my capacity as one of the hosts, rather than as a member of the body to which you pay this gracious compliment.

“It is not for me to speak of another figure necessarily missing to-night, though often with you heretofore at these meetings—the member of the Ohio Society who sent us to Paris! A great and shining record already speaks for him. He will be known in our history as the president who freed America from the Spanish blight; who realized the aspiration of our earlier statesmen, cherished by the leaders of either party through three-quarters of a century, for planting the flag both on Cuba and on the Sandwich Islands; more than this, as the president who has carried that flag half-way round the world and opened the road for the trade of the nation to follow it.

“All this came from simply doing his duty, from day to day, as that duty was forced upon him. No other man in the United States held back from war as he did, risking loss of popularity, risking the hostility of Congress, risking the harsh judgment of friends in agonizing for peace. It was no doubt in the spirit of the Prince of Peace; but it was also with the wisdom of Polonius, ‘Beware of entrance to a quarrel; but, being in, bear’st that th’ opposed may beware of thee.’ Never again will any nation imagine that it can trespass indefinitely against the United States with impunity. Never again will an American warship run greater risks in a peaceful harbor than in battle. The world will never again be in doubt whether, when driven to war, we will end it in a gush of sentimentality or a shiver of unmanly apprehension over untried responsibilities, by fleeing from our plain duty, and at the same time giving up what we are entitled to, before we have even taken an opportunity to look at it.

“But it must be confessed that looking at it during the past week has not been an altogether cheerful occupation. While the aspect of some of these new possessions remains so frowning there are faint hearts ready enough to say that the Peace Commission is in no position to be receiving compliments. Does protection protect? is an old question that used to be thrown in our faces—though I believe even the questioners finally made up their minds that it did. Does peace pacify? is the question of the hour. Well, as to our great antagonist, historic, courageous Spain, there seems ground to hope and believe and be glad that it does—not merely toward us, but within her own borders. When she jettisoned cargo that had already shifted ruinously, there is reason to think that she averted disaster and saved the ship. Then as to Porto Rico there is no doubt of peace; and as to Cuba very little—although it would be too much to hope that twelve years of civil war could be followed by an absolute calm, without disorders.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“As to other possessions in the farther East, we may as well recognize at once that we are dealing now with the same sort of clever barbarians as in the earlier days of the Republic, when, on another ocean not then less distant, we were compelled to encounter the Algerian pirates. But there is this difference. Then we merely chastised the Algerians into letting us and our commerce alone. The permanent policing of that coast of the Mediterranean was not imposed upon us by surrounding circumstances, or by any act of ours—it belonged to nearer nations. Now a war we made has broken down the only authority that existed to protect the commerce of the world in one of its greatest Eastern thoroughfares, and to preserve the lives and property of people of all nations resorting to those marts. We broke it down, and we cannot, dare not, display the cowardice and selfishness of failing to replace it. However men may differ as to our future policy in those regions, there can be no difference as to our present duty. It is as plain as that of putting down a riot in Chicago, or New York—all the plainer, because we have until recently ourselves been taking the very course and doing the very things to encourage the rioters.

“A distinguished and patriotic citizen said to me the other day, in a Western city: ‘You might have avoided this trouble in the Senate by refusing title in the Philippines, exactly as in Cuba, and simply enforcing renunciation of Spanish sovereignty. Why didn’t you do it?’ The question is important, and the reason ought to be understood. But at the outset it should be clearly realized that the circumstances which made it possible to take that course as to Cuba were altogether exceptional. For three-quarters of a century we had asserted a special interest and right of interference there as against any other nation. It is directly on our coast, and no one doubted that at least as much order as in the past would be preserved there, even if we had to do it ourselves. There was also the positive action of Congress, which on the one hand gave us excuse for refusing a sovereignty our highest legislative authority had disclaimed, and on the other formally cast the shield of our responsibility over the island when left without a government or a sovereignty. Besides there was a people there advanced enough, sufficiently compact and homogeneous in religion, race and language, sufficiently used already to the methods of government, to warrant our Republican claim that the sovereignty was not being left in the air; that it was only left where in the last analysis and in a civilized community it must always reside, in the people themselves.

“And yet, under all these conditions, the most difficult task your Peace Commissioners had at Paris was to maintain and defend the demand for a renunciation of sovereignty without anybody’s acceptance of the sovereignty thus renounced. International law has not been so taught or practiced abroad; and it may be frankly confessed that the Spanish arguments on this point were learned, acute, sustained by the general judgment of Europe, and not easy to refute.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ A similar demand concerning the Philippines neither could nor ought to have been acquiesced in by the civilized world. Here were ten millions of people on a great highway of commerce, some semi-civilized, some barbarous, others mere pagan savages, but nothing like a majority or even a respectable minority of them accustomed to self-government or believed to be capable of it. Sovereignty over such a conglomeration and in such a place could not be left in the air. The civilized world would not recognize its transfer, unless transferred to somebody. Renunciation under such circumstances would have been equivalent in international law to abandonment, and that would have been equivalent to anarchy and a race for seizure among the nations that could get there quickest.

“ We could, of course, have refused to accept the obligations of a civilized, responsible nation. After breaking down government in those commercial centres, we could have refused to set up anything in its stead, and simply washed our hands of the whole business; but to do that would have been to show ourselves more insensible to moral obligations than if we had restored them outright to Spain.

“ Well, if the elephant must be on our hands, what are we going to do with it? That is the next question. I venture to answer that first we must put down the riot. The lives and property of German and British merchants must be at least as safe in Manila as they were under Spanish rule before we are ready for any other step whatever.

“ Next ought we not to try to diagnose our case before we turn every quack doctor among us loose on it; understand what the problem is before beginning heated partisan discussions as to the easiest way of solving it? And next, we will probably fare best in the end if we try to profit somewhat by the experience others have had in like cases.

“ The widest experience has been had by the great nation whose people and institutions are nearest like our own. Illustrations of her successful methods may be found in Egypt and in many British dependencies, but for our purpose probably best of all either on the Malay Peninsula or on the north coast of Borneo, where she has had the happiest results in dealing with intractable types of the worst of these same races. Some rules, drawn from this experience, might be distasteful to people who look upon new possessions as merely so much more government patronage, and quite repugnant to the noble army of office-seekers; but they surely mark the path of safety.

“ The first is to meddle at the outset as little as possible with every native custom and institution and even prejudice. The next is to use every existing native agency you can, and the next to employ in the government service just as few Americans as you can, and only of the best. Convince the natives of your irresistible power and your inexorable purpose; then of your desire to be absolutely just, and after that, not before, be as kind as you can. At the outset you will doubtless find your best agents among the trained officers of the navy and the army, particularly the former. On the retired list of both, but again particularly of the navy, ought to be found just the experience, in contact with foreign races, the moderation, wide views, justice, rigid method and inflexible integrity you need. Later on should come a real civil service, with such pure and efficient administration abroad as might help us ultimately to conclude that we ourselves deserve as well as the heathen and induce us to set up similar standards for our own service at home. Meantime, if we have taught the heathen largely to govern themselves, without being a hindrance and menace to the civilization and the commerce of the world, so much the better. Heaven speed the day! If not, we must even continue to be responsible for them ourselves—a duty we did not seek, but should be ashamed to shirk."

Governor Bushnell, of Ohio, was next introduced, and upon rising was received with much enthusiasm. In part he said:

"Whether Westerners or Easterners, Celts or Teutons, Republicans or Democrats, expansionists or non-expansionists, we are all Buckeyes here to-night. This is one of the occasions that I could wish that the mantle of one of the world's greatest orators had fallen on me. But, no such legacy having been bequeathed to me, what I shall say will in no wise equal the oration of Mark Antony over the body of Cæsar.

"What I shall say will be in praise of our state, in glory of the city of New York and of the nation in which we live. My speech will be brief, because I have had the pleasure of being present two or three times on similar occasions to this festival to-night, and if I attempted to make anything like an extended address I should be like a friend of mine whose wife was giving a reception one evening. Just before the guests began to arrive she saw her husband carrying away all the umbrellas from the hat-rack. She said to him: 'Why, my dear, you don't need to take those umbrellas away. Our guests will not steal any of them.' 'Oh, that's not what troubles me,' he replied, 'I am only afraid the guests will recognize them.'

"There has been something said by the president to-night; about the state of Ohio. It is always a pleasure to me to come here and meet old citizens of Ohio, and not only that, but this is the grandest city of our country, and there is no place on the face of the globe where one can come and meet better friends or find more enjoyment than in this great city of yours.

"You expect me to say a word or two about Ohio, and I will do so with the proverbial modesty of the Ohioan. Ohio has furnished all the Republican presidents save the first and the greatest of them, and has plenty of timber left to furnish more. That is not saying that there are not plenty here in New York who would not make able presidents, but this is a matter we cannot turn over to your state. We have a few secrets in Ohio, which, however, I am not going to tell you to-night. But those secrets are nothing against the interest and glory of the country. There are a few little things that possibly you Buckeyes had best not know about, at least just now. We will let you know about them next fall.

“Ohio put the first troops in the field after the call of the president last spring, and to the glory of Ohio, it may be said that the first American soldier who lost his life in the Spanish war was an Ohioan. I mention this to let you know that Ohio is always in the front. You may possibly have heard about the Ohioan who, I think, on one occasion like this become a little confused in some way. After the evening entertainment he did not know exactly where he was, and some friends, in a joke, put him to sleep in a cemetery for the night. In the morning when he woke up he looked around and saw nothing but tombs and monuments. ‘Well,’ he exclaimed, ‘here’s Ohio, the first man at the resurrection.’

“I can understand why it is that New York city is growing so rapidly. A great many Ohioans are coming here and interesting themselves in the commercial affairs of New York. They come here to make money, but sometimes they go home with less than they brought with them.

“You have heard considerable talk about Manila and our new possessions. We hear a great deal of talk about the question in Ohio, but I don’t think they have any well-defined ideas as to what they are to do about it. The feeling now with the men there is that the Filipinos, for attacking our sailors and soldiers, should be punished to the extent of teaching them to respect the American nation and the American flag. When that is done it will be time enough to decide what course shall be taken with the Filipinos. When the proper time comes, I have no fear but that this country will act justly, and that the coming in contact with the Anglo-Saxon race and the Buckeyes who will go to those islands to start street railroads and other enterprises will have the effect before long of civilizing the natives and preparing them for governing themselves.

“But the matter which requires attending to immediately is that these natives must be taught to respect the country and the flag. When they have received this lesson then we will tell them what kind of government it will be to their advantage to have. This is the last time I shall come to join you at these dinners as Governor of Ohio. But I hope that when I go out of office you will be willing to extend to me an invitation to the fourteenth annual banquet, and I can assure you that it will be a great pleasure to me always to meet you at these dinners.

“Before closing, I may say that I have no fear of our government and that our Congress and President will be able to meet and manage the difficult problems that now present themselves with reference to our new possessions. The proper course for us to take, as the distinguished Senator from Delaware and his no less distinguished colleague, Mr. Reid, have told you, is to go forward, and let us show the nations of the world that America lives to assist those who need it and to redress wrongs wherever they exist."

General Merritt was then introduced, the chairman referring to him as Admiral Dewey's coadjutor, and the man who had written a chapter in the history of the United States that will live forever. As he arose three cheers were proposed and given. He said in part:

"My surprise to-night, after hearing so much about Ohio, has been to learn that so many Ohioans have come to New York to live. Ohio enterprise has done a great deal for New York. The Philippine question has been so ably discussed by Senator Gray and Mr. Reid that there is nothing for me to add. I am sure if the Filipinos had intelligence enough to understand the remarks which have been made here to-night they would be willing to submit. As it is, we shall have to beat them in on it. When I left Luzon and Manila I knew that a show of force on our part would quickly result in peace. Delay has been worse than dangerous. It has resulted in bloodshed, but we are prepared to assert our rule.

"I shall not speak at length of the army, preferring rather to say something about the navy. If I ever enter another world and should have the choice of service it would be in the navy. They carry their own houses with them, and do not have to lie in trenches or fight at short range. Admiral Dewey is entitled to all praise, and no American will withhold from him his need. I found in Admiral Dewey a cordial, warm-hearted supporter of anything that the army wanted to do. He was ready to assist in any way it was required. Admiral Dewey did his duty nobly. He deserves all the honor the nation can give him.

"I found the American army as it appeared in Manila composed of earnest, cordial, honest and hard-working men. The volunteers had much to learn. I sent my staff among them and the regulars, and found co-operation. The men wanted to learn, and they became as good as our regulars before I got through. I am sure you will be glad to know this, for, though I had no Ohio volunteers with me, I feel sure that they would have done as well as any of the others."

The next speaker was ex-Governor James E. Campbell, of Ohio, who spoke in part as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: I would include the ladies in this greeting, but friend Southard has already embraced them. But it is his privilege, for old men may do that with impunity, and therefore, you see, I am debarred from the pleasure. I am moved to say to-night, from being here with our honored peace commissioners, that 'God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform.' I was at a banquet like this one about four or five years ago—an Ohio banquet—and I remember how my friend, Michael D. Harter, who was one of God's noblemen, said in a set speech that we should not take the Hawaiian Islands. In an informal speech which I was called for as a volunteer I took issue with him, and I said that, while perhaps we ourselves would not see it, our children would like to see the island east of us and the islands west of us, the republic north of us and the republics south of us, and every land from the isthmus to the pole, under the American flag. The Hawaiian Islands have come to us, I might say, by force of gravity. We have also got great islands in the East and innumerable islands in the Far West.

"So far the result ought to be a source of pride to every American citizen. We got Porto Rico without any question, and we will get Cuba just as we got Texas.

"As to the Philippines, first we conquered them; second, these gentlemen beside me bought them. They are ours, and we can do what we want with them. Our first duty, I say, is to kill the assassins, the bushwhackers, the murderers who have been shooting down American soldiers. And to begin with, I should take Mr. Aguinaldo's gold collar off and put on one of another kind.

"And yet, I am not an expansionist. I belong to a party that cannot even expand over this country, and they are lucky if they get four years at a time. But I have a deep faith in American liberty, conscience and American love of justice, and I am sure that these qualities which have made America great in the world, and so acknowledged by the powers that constitute the world, will enable our government to cope with this question. I believe that our leaders can deal with it satisfactorily, and if they cannot the party to which I belong will do it for them in 1900.

"I am sorry that Judge Day is not here. His career has been that of a typical American. It could not have come to any one but him. Two years ago he was a practicing lawyer in a little country town in Ohio. We have got lots more like him out there. We have got thousands of them. They are our Ohio country boys, unambitious and mortal. But they are all Days if you give them a chance. Judge Day was first made assistant secretary of state. Then circumstances put him in first place, and he held that post in time of war and trouble. We are compelled to say as men and as Americans that he did well. Directly after this he was appointed to the peace commission, and there he made a record of which we may speak with pride. He was at the front of that body. He was the leader, and he conducted his negotiations, not with any underhand backdoor methods, but in an honest, manly, straightforward way.

"And there is another Ohio boy whom I would call to your attention.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

He was born in the same district which I once represented in Congress, and he was born in a county that invariably gave my opponent a majority of twenty-five thousand or upward. He is your neighbor and your friend. I always think of him first in connection with his great work on 'Ohio in the War.' And it is with feeling that I recall his description of the death of Colonel Minor Milligan as his greatest personal loss in the war. If Senator Gray's wife were here I would like to make her ears tingle with what I feel like saying about her husband. But I cannot say so many nice things before his face. I have seen a great deal of him in the Senate. We belong, you know, to the same long-suffering political party.

"These men have come to us, just out of a little war. People did not know what they wanted before the war began. Some of you New Yorkers did not want war. There were men interested in stocks that had too many tickers in their back offices to hanker after war, but ever since the 15th of February, 1898, I have hoped and devoutly prayed for war. Ever since 266 American sailors went to their death as martyrs on the Maine I have wished to punish the perpetrators of that black deed. We owed atonement and an avenging to ourselves and to posterity. And the war came. The army did not have much chance to show what they could do. They might have had a chance. There's no telling. But remember that some time ago we spent four years killing each other, and in that terrific struggle more men were killed than Great Britain has lost since the time of Norman conquest. A foreign war was needed to show the nations of the world just what our army was. Well, they went ahead and cleaned out everybody in sight. I don't suppose they could have done any more than that. But I know they could have done that with their eyes shut and one hand tied behind them.

"And now I come to my toast—'Our Navy.' How shall I speak of it? The tongues of angels are needed to give to it an adequate eulogy and worthily portray its glories, for no human tongue can pay a sufficient tribute to the United States Navy. I speak not alone for our new navy, which has just made our English cousins find out how nearly related they are to us, and the roar of whose guns has made the decadents in Paris stop sneering at us. It is a great navy. I was in Congress when the appropriation was made for our first battleship, under the greatest of secretaries, your fellow-townsmen, William C. Whitney. Its glories are so great that I need not recite them. Who was the first man killed? Was he a soldier? No, he was a sailor. He was a sailor from Ohio, and was buried only yesterday in the churchyard of a little Ohio town. He was James B. McPherson, who was killed off Cardenas. A few hours later the first officer was killed—Worth Bagley, who was, thank God, the son of a North Carolina rebel. It was an atonement in blood. The Civil War was over.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ And George Dewey. What can I say of him? I saw by to-day’s paper that he said he would under no circumstances consider a nomination for the Presidency of the United States. I thought deeply over that, and I thought what a mistake it was that he was not born in Ohio.

“ And about Schley and Sampson. I don’t believe in controversies. Each man did his duty. It was one commander’s lot not to be at Santiago, and for him I have nothing but praise. But one of them was there. And his ship was hit forty-seven times. If the American people do not do justice to that brave man we must blush with shame forever after.”

President William R. Harper, of the University of Chicago, who followed ex-Governor Campbell, and who began to speak at twenty minutes after 12, said: “ To-day is Sunday, so you’ll have plenty of time to recuperate later.” Continuing, he said, in part:

“ A new feeling of patriotism has recently come among us. The old feeling was strong, but with most of us not tangible. I say most of us, for the number of those whose lives were quickened in the Civil War grows less each day, and while many souls ripened thereby into a high patriotism, in many was engendered a sectional hate without occasion for the kindling of the patriotic flame. It lies dormant; but occasion came, and at once the spark shot up. How quick the response of heart to heart and the warming up of every soul, as the story of victory after victory passed from mouth to mouth! It was as if an electric current had taken hold of dead men and transformed them into living beings.

“ Here and there have been those who did not so share the joy and enthusiasm of this new feeling, with their vision of the future bound by the horizon of a past long departed and their apprehension of difficulties increased beyond all measure of true apportionment. With their conception of the possibilities of this country based upon a calculation adapted to countries of far different situation and resources, they have stood and still stand in fear before the confusion and disaster which they assure us must follow the strange and sudden burst of popular enthusiasm. These men are patriotic according to their light, and their light is either the dim and fitful gloom which just precedes the dawn of day or the dark and heavy shade of night, settling down upon hearts and minds already under the spell of the despair of a pessimistic philosophy. In such times as these the thinking man asks himself: What is the love of country? How comes it and upon what basis does it rest? What duties does it impose? And what satisfaction does it cultivation bring?

“ Love of country, like father and mother love, is a sentiment in the growth of which hundreds of centuries have been employed. Its evolution is easily traced. The savage has no love of country. He is a member of a clan whose members are related by blood. The wandering nomad is scarcely yet in a position to understand the meaning of patriotism. He has no land; there is as yet no nation; it is still the idea of the clan which controls. The agriculturist who had taken possession of a track of land may begin to develop the love of country. Several tribes are joined together and institutions common to all begin to spring up. Life takes on new forms. With the building of cities arose the possibility of a patriotism greater in scope than any which had yet preceded. The incitement of close contract, the momentum of vigorous co-operation, continued to produce the solidarity that alone furnishes the field suitable for the growth of patriotism.

“Among the Chinese there is no political feeling, and there can hardly be said to exist such a thing as national spirit. The controlling factor is the domestic spirit. Among the Egyptians the national institutions suggested oppression, and were of such a nature as not to win the love of the people. Israel’s patriotism was religious fanaticism. Greek patriotism, for the most part, was something selfish and narrow. The Romans had but one duty—service to Rome.

“Our patriotism is domestic, and has also a religious feeling. Our patriotism has the unity which characterized that of Rome. From whatever state or city we come, we are Americans. The unity of Rome, though a single city, was not greater than the unity of the United States as it finds embodiment in the national government. However distinct and separated the parts of the whole, the whole is none the less the unity into which the power and energy of all the parts find entrance. This may have been only partially true during the last forty years, but the events of nine months have surely removed any doubts which the world has entertained in this regard.”

The menu card and programme consisted of a handsome and artistic folder, nearly one foot square. Upon the front cover was an American flag in colors, surrounded by branches of the buckeye tree. This was followed by a picture of the American eagle, standing on the North American continent, with one protecting wing extended over Cuba and Porto Rico, and the other over Hawaii and the Philippines. The title page was as follows:

THIRTEENTH
ANNUAL BANQUET
OF THE
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK
IN HONOR OF THE
AMERICAN PEACE COMMISSIONERS
AT THE
WALDORF-ASTORIA
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1899.

CHAPTER XV.

MR. CHANCE, at the meeting of March 13th, presented a paper setting forth the claims in favor of November 29, 1802, as the date when Ohio was admitted to the Union. A vote of thanks was extended, and the matter was discussed by several of the members.

The "sixth annual ladies' reception and dance," as it was announced on the programme, was given at the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of April 5th. It was in charge of the entertainment committee, consisting of Warren Higley, chairman; Peter H. Burnett, Noah H. Swayne 2d, David H. Bates, Jr., and Andrew Ernest Foyé. The following gentlemen served as a floor committee: Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; David Homer Bates, Jr., Peter H. Burnett, Henry B. C. Plimpton, Howard Elmer Crall, William H. Jennings, Emmet B. Wheeler. The following ladies consented to serve as hostesses: Mrs. Milton I. Southard, Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. William L. Strong, Mrs. Wager Swayne, Mrs. Wallace C. Andrews, Mrs. George E. Armstrong, Mrs. Thomas H. Wheeler, Mrs. Warren Higley, Mrs. David H. Bates, Mrs. Henry B. Wilson, Mrs. William L. Brown, Mrs. Anson G. McCook.

The reception committee was constituted as follows: William L. Strong, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, Wager Swayne, Wallace C. Andrews, Colgate Hoyt, Peter F. Collier, David H. Bates, Henry B. Wilson, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Daniel Pritchard, L. D. Morrison, Rollin M. Morgan, Ralph W. Carroll, Sherman M. Granger, Milton I. Southard, George E. Armstrong, Samuel Thomas, Thomas H. Wheeler, William L. Brown, Frank C. Loveland, Noah H. Swayne 2d, Peter H. Burnett, Evarts L. Prentiss, DeFrees Critten, Elijah G. Boardman, Charles H. Niehaus, Walter S. Sullivan, Samuel McMillan.

There was an elaborate order of dances and supper was served. Like the previous entertainments of a similar nature, it was a success.

In the April meeting President Southard and Judge Higley were constituted a committee to express to Mrs. General Henry L. Burnett the Society's appreciation of her gift of a badge to be worn by the wife of the president of the Society, at all the public functions. It was decided that a committee of three from the governing committee be appointed by the president to secure a larger attendance of members at the regular meetings. The president asked Colgate Hoyt to recount some of his experiences during a trip to Cuba and the West Indies in company with ex-Senator Sherman of Ohio. Mr. Hoyt gave a most interesting narration of the trip and of the transfer of ex-Senator Sherman to the Chicago, sent to convey him home.

D. H. Bates suggested that ex-Mayor Strong be asked to describe some of the experiences of his son, Major Putnam Bradlee Strong, in the Philippines. Colonel Strong responded with some stirring experiences of Colonel Fred Funston and of Major Strong as interpreter, envoy, and officer at the front, where, by his grave and gallant conduct, he won the commendation of his superior.

By vote of the Society on May 8th word was officially sent to the members that each Monday evening had been set aside as its time when "the Ohio Society would be especially at home in its rooms." The governing committee, in the same month, passed a vote appreciative of the hospitality of Colgate Hoyt, who had given the members of the committee a delightful outing on board his yacht "Tide." The last meeting of the season took the form of a dinner at Morelli's, where short speeches were made by Messrs. Hoyt, Hopkins, Granger, Lefler, Doyle and Chance.

In the meeting of October 9th a committee consisting of Judge Higley, Mahlon Chance and Colonel Strong were authorized to express the thanks of the Society to Mrs. S. S. Packard for the gift of a portrait of her deceased husband. The following gentlemen were chosen as a nominating committee to select officers for the ensuing year: Thomas Ewing, L. D. Morrison, J. D. Gillett, Colgate Hoyt, H. C. Plimpton, J. W. Jennings, F. F. Ward. On November 13th the committee reported the following ticket: President, Milton I. Southard; vice-presidents, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H. Wheeler, George E. Armstrong, Warren Higley, Colgate Hoyt; secretary, William H. Blymer; recording secretary, Walter S. Sullivan; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, Francis B. Stedman, Evarts L. Prentiss, R. C. Penfield.

The annual meeting, again in the form of an informal dinner, was held on the usual date, November 29th. The secretary was instructed to cast one vote for the candidates proposed, and they were all declared elected. Speeches were made by Flamen Ball Candler, Colgate Hoyt, Gen. Henry L. Burnett and Charles A. Winter. Mr. Crall, treasurer, made his annual report, showing a clear balance of $5,761.57. The annual report of the governing committee was presented by Colgate Hoyt, chairman, who said, among other things:

"Gentlemen: Another year, one replete with interest and that speaks volumes for the welfare and prosperity of the Society, has come and gone.

"Fifty brother Buckeyes have been elected to membership in the Society within the year, thirty-three of them being resident and seventeen non-resident members. The grim reaper, Death, has not spared us in the year just closed, for nine honored members have been added to the list of those who have passed into the great unknown. First among them was the Hon. Calvin S. Brice, one of the founders of the Society, followed by Mr. John Dickson, Colonel A. L. Conger, Mr. Warren F. Leland, Wallace C. Andrews, Esq., another one of the charter members, whose sad fate and that of his estimable wife and relatives is still fresh in the minds of all; Mr. William Kraus, Mr. Phillip A. Bond, Warren H. Corning, Esq., and Major John A. Logan. Committees were appointed to draft suitable resolutions and testimonials, copies of which were sent to the families of the deceased, and also spread upon the minutes and made a part of the records of the Society.

“It is one of the characteristics of the Ohioan to hold on to a good thing when he has it, but several have departed from that rule and tendered their resignations as members which were accepted, while a few others have so far forgotten themselves as to fall in arrears for dues and have consequently been dropped from the rolls. The membership, however, is at present very near the ‘four hundred’ mark, and a little exertion on the part of our members will bring it up to the half thousand before another year has ended.

“The growth of the Society has been remarkable and is steadily on the increase and it ranks to-day as one of the leading organizations of its kind in the country. The home of the Buckeye is now and ever will be one of the attractive features of the metropolis.

“Respectfully submitted,

“COLGATE HOYT, Chairman.”

Thomas Ewing was elected chairman of the governing committee, and Andrew J. C. Foyé, Francis B. Stedman and Rollin M. Morgan became members of the house committee. The president announced the following committees: Literature and art, Charles H. Niehaus, chairman; Mahlon Chance, Alexander Doyle, Noah H. Swayne 2d, William L. Hawk; entertainment, Warren Higley, chairman; Andrew Ernest Foyé, Henry C. Plimpton, Putnam Bradlee Strong, Albert F. Hagar; library, Daniel Pritchard, chairman; William H. Caldwell, Charles H. Clegg, Lovell H. Carr, Warner Ells; auditing, Henry A. Glassford, chairman; David H. Bates, Frank C. Loveland, Richard J. Chard, De Fries Critten.

At the December meeting Major Putnam Bradlee Strong, a son of ex-Major Strong, delivered an interesting account of his experiences as a soldier in the Philippines.

The first meeting of the Society in 1900 was held on January 8th at the St. Denis. William H. Blymyer, secretary of the Society, delivered an enlightening and entertaining address on the work of the “Word’s Peace Conference,” based upon his personal observations and studies at The Hague during the sessions of the commissioners. Mr. Blymyer put into marked contrast the frank and open spirit of our representatives, and the indirect methods of their associates, remarking that all propositions advanced by the United States with the purpose of creating an agreement which would be binding on the powers, were, in the end, rendered ineffective or nugatory by qualifying conditions. The speaker was of the opinion that the adoption of the proposed agreement by the United States would retard the establishment of an effective treaty of peace. The address of Mr. Corey, who was the American consul at Amsterdam at the time the Peace Conference was proposed, furnished a fitting complement to the discussion of the subject by the preceding speaker. Mr. Corey gave a picturesque account of the Dutch people and their characteristics and spoke at some length of their great desire for peace and of the efforts that had been made by the Dutch ladies especially, through the establishment in the kingdom of Peace societies, which possessed great influence and efficiency. Mr. Corey took an optimistic view of the results of the peace agitation in progress in Holland, and put an interpretation upon the Czar's proposal for the peace conference, which was most fair and generous to the sincerity of that monarch's intention. "The fact of such a conference being held," he said, "was a great step toward peace." The American idea of diplomacy, which was discovered in the deliberations of the American commissioners, produced an impression upon the other powers represented, which was salutary, and in his opinion would be far-reaching in the direction of universal peace in the future.

At the February meeting David Homer Bates read an interesting paper on personal reminiscences of President Lincoln. A number of members related interesting incidents in the life of the martyred president.

The banquet of 1900 was a memorable event in the history of the Ohio Society. It not only had the President of the United States, himself an Ohio man, as its guest of honor, but also entertained a future President of the United States in the person of the then governor of New York, Theodore Roosevelt. The occasion was made still more memorable because President McKinley, in his speech, sounded the keynote of the presidential campaign soon to open. There also sat at the guests' table a number of other eminent men, comprising a governor and ex-governor of Ohio and Senator Marcus A. Hanna of Ohio, and his successor, the Hon. Charles Dick.

This fourteenth annual banquet was given at the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of Saturday, March 3. It was in charge of a committee composed of the following gentlemen: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; William L. Strong, William L. Brown, Samuel Thomas, Whitelaw Reid, Leander H. Crall, Henry B. Wilson, Warren Higley, Emerson McMillin, F. H. Kingsbury, Louis D. Clarke, Rollin M. Morgan, Richard J. Chard, Wager Swayne, Milton I. Southard, Anson G. McCook, Colgate Hoyt, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Wheeler, David Homer Bates, Mahlon Chance, J. Q. A. Ward, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Thomas A. Edison, Flamen Ball Chandler, William H. Blymyer, secretary. The following gentlemen served as a reception committee: Putnam Bradlee Strong, chairman; William S. Hawk, Francis B. Stedman, Raymond C. Penfield, Wm. Ford Upson, Defrees Critten, Lowell M. Palmer, J. A. Fordyce, James G. Newcomb, Daniel Pritchard, Wade Chance, Andrew Ernest Foyé, Henry C. Plimpton, Evarts L. Prentiss, Samuel H. Parsons, Albert Francis Hagar, Addison W. Gilmore, Warner Ells, A. D. Houston, Peter H. Burnett, H. B. Brundrett, Walter S. Sullivan.

The menu card was an elaborate and beautiful souvenir of the occasion. It was enclosed in a covering of hand-made carmine colored paper tied with silken cords and impressed with buckeye leaves. Upon the first page of the nine leaves were grouped the portraits of the presidents that Ohio had given to the country—William Henry Harrison, Ulysses S. Grant, Rutherford B. Hayes, James A. Garfield, Benjamin Harrison and William McKinley. Beneath the group was this title:

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL BANQUET
OF THE
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK
IN HONOR OF THE
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES
AT THE WALDORF-ASTORIA
SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 3, 1890.

There followed two pages of quotations from famous men, bearing upon the history of Ohio and of the nation, accompanied by illustrations that illuminated the historic texts.

When President McKinley accepted the invitation to be present, he insisted that he should not be called upon to speak. He was persuaded, however, after he arrived in New York, to forego that proviso, and, in consequence, responding to the toast of his health he permitted himself to dwell briefly upon the problems which the nation's Spanish war had left with the country.

The American people, the President asserted, must choose between manly doing and base desertion. Partisanship, he contended, could hold few against public duty, and with a fervor that carried every one of his hearers with him, he declared that it was not possible that seventy-five millions of American free-men could not establish liberty and justice and good government in the new possessions of the United States.

Fourteenth Annual Banquet
of the
Ohio Society of New York

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Although President McKinley took the precaution of reading his speech, little effect was lost in its delivery. He was frequently interrupted for a full minute, while his auditors rose to their feet in a body, cheering and waving handkerchiefs and table napkins.

The banquet hall of the Waldorf-Astoria was a brilliant scene of light and color. Upon the floor of the hall fully five hundred diners were seated, while in the galleries above there was a large gathering of women, whose costumes added to the general picturesqueness of the festival.

In a box specially reserved for her, facing the guests' table, Mrs. McKinley sat. She came in before the last course was served, and was greeted with tumultuous cheering. Springing to their feet, the diners cheered her for several minutes, while Mrs. McKinley stood bowing her acknowledgments. Accompanying her were Mrs. Abner McKinley, Miss Mabel McKinley, Miss Barber, George Barber, William S. Hawk and Dr. P. M. Rixey. Among the occupants of the surrounding boxes were Mrs. Perkins, of Akron, Ohio; Mrs. Kingsley, Mrs. John A. McCall, Mrs. Milton I. Southard, Mrs. Andrew J. C. Foyé, Mrs. H. L. Burnett, Mrs. William L. Strong, Mrs. Warren Higley, Mrs. Thomas H. Wheeler, Mrs. John H. Langstreet, Mrs. John S. White, Mrs. R. C. Penfield, Mrs. Sydney J. Smith, Mrs. A. B. Wilson, Mrs. William Ford Upson, Mrs. and Miss Beer, Mrs. George Howes, Miss Jessie Hoyt, Mrs. A. D. Houston, Mrs. William H. Blymyer, Mrs. Defrees Critten, Mrs. S. H. Parsons, Mrs. E. T. Cushing, Mrs. E. I. Benner, Mrs. S. C. Byrd, Mrs. Russell Groves, Mrs. Winchester Fitch and Mrs. E. H. Fitch.

The Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, governor of New York, did not reach the hotel until about 10 P. M. As he made his way to the president's table he was heartily cheered. A seat was given him next to President McKinley, and until the speaking began the President and the governor were engaged in close conversation. No one who saw them together forecast the historic and tragic events through which in so short a time they should pass together.

Before the dinner a reception was held in the Astor Gallery, where an opportunity was afforded to the members and guests of the society to meet the President.

Shortly after 7 o'clock the President was escorted to the banqueting room by President Milton I. Southard, his entrance being marked by the playing of "Hail to the Chief." Seated with Mr. Southard and the President at the guest table were Henry R. Towne, Julien T. Davies, Tunis G. Bergen, John Barrett, Charles Dick, Pension Commissioner H. Clay Evans, Adjutant-General H. C. Corbin, James H. Hoyt, Lieutenant-Governor Woodruff, ex-Vice-President Morton, Governor Roosevelt, Governor George K. Nash, of Ohio; Cornelius N. Bliss, Senator Hanna, ex-Governor James E. Campbell, of Ohio; Solicitor-General John K. Richards, Judge Addison Brown, George B. Wilson, Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Thomas H. Hubbard, the Rev. Edwin H. Krans, Judge James A. O'Gorman, and Charles G. Dawes, controller of the currency.

In his address of welcome Mr. Southard, as toastmaster, said:

"Gentlemen: It is my pleasant duty to welcome you to another annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York. And this welcome is extended to the ladies also who grace us with their presence. I trust I may be permitted to salute them as the gallant Judge Varnum saluted their great-grandmothers at the first Fourth of July celebration, in 1783, at Marietta, Ohio, as 'the amiable partners of our delicate pleasures.'

"We are fortunate, gentlemen, in having with us this evening, as our guest of honor, the President of the United States. We honor him as the chief executive of the nation, as a native Ohioan, and for his genial character and great achievements. We are glad to welcome him here, and our welcome is spontaneous, sincere and most cordial.

"And to the first lady of the land, who has seen fit to favor us with her gracious presence, we extend our most hearty greetings. We feel honored by her presence, and our grateful esteem will go with her always.

"We are told that the pioneers of Ohio spread their banquets in the wilderness, with a menu of 'Bear meat, johnny cake and whiskey.'

"That was indeed strong diet, but we must remember that it fed strong men. They were stalwart in brain and brawn, and ate and wrought heroically. They felled the trees; they built the cabins; they repelled the savages, and they founded a state, with hearts as cheery and souls as free as ever danced in the sunlight of luxury. They dispensed a generous hospitality of such as they had, and made no apologies for their crude surroundings. Indeed, they were proud of the buckeye cabin. They joyed about its fireside; they set it to poetry; they made it the party shibboleth of a Presidential campaign.

Oh, where, tell me where,
Was your buckeye cabin made?
'Twas built among the merry boys
Who wield the plough and spade,
Where the log cabins stand
In the bonnie buckeye shade.

"This buckeye tree is remarkable in many ways. It possesses æsthetic, medicinal and utilitarian properties, as well as a large nomenclature. It is 'hetock' in Indian, 'Ohioensis' in botany, 'buckeye' in English and 'Presidents' in politics.

"Behold in our souvenir what superb presidential fruitage it bears!

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“But, gentlemen, an occasion like this is fruitful of more serious thought. As we assemble to commemorate our native state, the great deeds of our pioneer ancestors come up before us and awaken inquiry. How was the great Northwest Territory acquired? How was it settled and reclaimed to civilization? What manner of men were the participants in it? From whence did they come? How has it grown and developed into a vast empire of wealth and population? How has it influenced the history and destiny of the United States? What will be its potency on the future welfare of our beloved country? How will it speak as a factor on the great problems thrust upon us through the acquisition of far distant island possessions? All these inquiries and more crowd upon the mind and struggle for utterance. But they cannot be answered within the limits allotted to me. Permit me, however, to state in a word the four cardinal features upon which this magnificent structure rests. They are union, liberty, education and religion. These beneficent principles were firmly established in the earliest ordinances and statutes and have ever since been sacredly cherished and heroically maintained. No blight of slavery, of caste, of bigotry or of intolerance was permitted in the beginning, but all the foundations of free government were then laid as secure and perfect as the fruits of after study and experience could possibly make them. And in this grand inception of government Ohio and her four sister states stand without a parallel in the history of the world.”

Mr. Southard closed by proposing the toast, “The President of the United States!” The toast was drunk standing, and when President McKinley arose to respond he was greeted by cheers again and again repeated.

It was on this occasion that McKinley perpetrated one of the best of his few public jokes. Looking at Mr. Southard reproachfully, he said: “I came to this banquet on the express promise that I should not be asked to make a speech.” He paused for a moment and then continued: “Therefore, I have carefully prepared myself.”

It was on this occasion that McKinley perpetrated one of the best of his speech. He said: “Mr. Toastmaster and Gentlemen: I appreciate your welcome and thank you for this renewed expression of your good will. It is proper that I should say that the managing board of the Ohio Society has kept the promise made to me that I would not be expected or required to speak at this banquet. I shall not be guilty of reflecting on their good faith or breaking my own resolution not to speak if I indulge in some observations while expressing in the briefest manner the pleasure which I have in greeting my old friends of the Ohio colony in New York. There is a bond of close fellowship which unites Ohio people. Whithersoever they journey or wherever they dwell, they cherish the tenderest sentiment for their mother state, and she in turn never fails of affectionate interest in her widely scattered children.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“The statement which has so often been made is not far from the truth, ‘Once an Ohioan always an Ohioan.’ It has been some years since I was your guest. Much has happened in the meantime. We have had our blessings and our burdens, and still have both. We will soon have legislative assurance of the continuance of the gold standard, with which we measure our exchanges, and we have the open door in the Far East, through which to market our products. We are neither in alliance nor antagonism nor entanglement with any foreign power, but on terms of amity and cordiality with all. We buy from them all and sell to them all, and our sales exceeded our purchases in the last two years by over $1,000,000,000. Markets have been increased and mortgages have been reduced.

“Interest has fallen and wages have advanced. The public debt is decreasing. The country is well to do. Its people for the most part are happy and contented. They have good times and are on good terms with the nations of the world. There are, unfortunately, those among us, few in number I am sure, who seem to thrive best under bad times and who when good times overtake them in the United States feel constrained to put us on bad terms with the rest of mankind. With them I can have no sympathy. I would rather give expression to what I believe to be the nobler and almost universal sentiment of my countrymen in the wish not only for our peace and prosperity, but for the peace and prosperity of all the nations and people of the earth.

“After thirty-three years of unbroken peace came an unavoidable war. Happily, the conclusion was quickly reached, without a suspicion of unworthy motive or practice or purpose on our part and with fadeless honor to our arms. I cannot forget the quick response of the people to the country’s need, and the quarter of a million men who freely offered their lives to their country’s service. It was an impressive spectacle of national strength. It demonstrated our mighty reserve power, and taught us that large standing armies are unnecessary when every citizen is a ‘minute man’ ready to join the ranks for national defense.

“Out of these recent events have come to the United States grave trials and responsibilities. As it was the nation’s war, so are its results the nation’s problems. Its solution rests upon us all. It is too serious to stifle. It is too earnest for repose. No phrase or catchword can conceal the sacred obligation it involves. No use of epithets, no aspersion of motive by those who differ will contribute to that sober judgment so essential to right conclusions. No political outcry can abrogate our treaty of peace with Spain or absolve us from its solemn engagements. It is the people’s question, and will be until the determination is written out in their enlightened verdict. We must choose between manly doing and base desertion. It will never be the latter. It must be soberly settled in justice and good conscience, and it will be. Righteousness, which exalteth a nation, must control in its solution.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM MCKINLEY

“No great emergency has arisen in this nation’s history and progress which has not been met by the sovereign with high capacity, with ample strength and with unflinching fidelity to every honorable obligation. Partisanship can hold few of us against solemn public duty. We have seen this so often demonstrated in the past as to mark unerringly what it will be in the future. The national sentiment and the national conscience were never stronger or higher than now. There has been a reunion of the people around the holy altar consecrated to country newly sanctified by common sacrifices. The followers of Grant and Lee have fought under the same flag and fallen for the same faith.

“Party lines have loosened and the ties of Union have been strengthened. Sectionalism has disappeared and fraternity has been rooted in the hearts of the American people. Political passion has altogether subsided and patriotism glows with inextinguishable fervor in every home of the land. The flag has been sustained on distant seas and islands by the men of all parties and sections and creeds and races and nationalities, and its stars are only those of radiant hope to the remote peoples over whom it floats.

“There can be no imperialism. Those who fear it are against it. Those who have faith in the Republic are against it. So that there is universal abhorrence for it and unanimous opposition to it. Our only difference is that those who do not agree with us have no confidence in the virtue or capacity or high purpose or good faith of this free people as a civilizing agency; while we believe that the century of free government which the American people have enjoyed has not rendered them irresolute and faithless, but has fitted them for the great task of lifting up and assisting to better condition and larger liberty these distant people who have through the issue of battle become our wards. Let us fear not. There is no occasion for faint hearts, no excuse for regrets. Nations do not grow in strength and the cause of liberty and law by the doing of easy things. The harder the task the greater will be the result, the benefit and the honor. To doubt our power to accomplish it is to lose faith in the soundness and strength of our popular institutions.

“The liberators will never become the oppressors. A self-governed people will never permit despotism in any government which they foster and defend.

“Gentlemen, we have the new care and cannot shift it. And, breaking up the camp of ease and isolation, let us bravely and hopefully and soberly continue the march of faithful service and falter not until the work is done. It is not possible that seventy-five millions of American freemen are unable to establish liberty and justice and good government in our new possessions. The burden is our opportunity. The opportunity is greater than the burden.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

May God give us strength to bear the one and wisdom so to embrace the other as to carry to our distant acquisitions the guarantees of ' life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness! ' ”

The next speaker was Lieutenant-Governor Timothy L. Woodruff, whose toast was " The Empire State. " He said :

" Mr. President and Gentlemen: Great, indeed, is the privilege on any occasion to respond to the sentiment, ' The Empire State, ' but to-night, surrounded by the members of the Ohio Society of New York, the President of the United States, the governor of our commonwealth, and many other distinguished guests, it is an honor which I deeply appreciate.

" The Ohio Society flourishes here in the full vigor of its native clime, in obedience to the inflexible laws of nature. While not indigenous to our soil, this flower of state societies is not an exotic. Slipped from the rugged stock of the original states, the tender plant has extended into mighty proportions on the banks of the Ohio, to be here re-engrafted for the strengthening of the parent stock from which it sprang. Ohio is the daughter of New York. She is just as good as wheat—the wheat she garners in generous sheaves each golden autumn. Like wheat, many of her illustrious sons have been carefully cradled, sometimes threshed, and are now the flower of the national family.

" In the creation of New York nature was in her most generous mood. She made it indeed the Empire state. On the west she set two inland seas of sapphire and bound them rough wrought together by the rapids and cataracts of Niagara, a symbol of national majesty and power. Then she spun a broad silver river, dotted with a thousand isles, for a northern confine, buttressing the east with the mountains of New England and flanking the south with the forests of Pennsylvania. In the heart of the state she planted a health-giving forest of evergreens—a sportsman's paradise—in the shaded seclusion of whose mountain slopes rises the American Rhine, grand and picturesque as it breaks through the mountains of the Catskills and flows along the base of the Palisades toward this metropolis of the nation, where in the plenitude of her bounty nature has brought the sea to the feet of the Empire state.

" Having finished this mighty task, Dame Nature left the settlement of the paradise she had here created to the denizens of earth—the farmer, the merchant and the manufacturer. Intrusting to their care the Empire state, she then turned her attention to Ohio, and peopled it with statesmen—occasionally a farmer, a merchant, a manufacturer, but mostly presidents.

" As I listened to his able speech a week ago before the Michigan Club in Detroit, on the subject of the Northwest Territory, I noted with jealous regret the omission by Governor Nash of Ohio to mention that New York was the first of the Thirteen Colonies to cede to the general government her right, title and interest in the Northwest Territory, of which Ohio was a part. This cession was made even two years before the close of the War for Independence, and four years before Massachusetts could be induced to relinquish her interest in this territory. New York again demonstrated her friendship toward Ohio by being the first among the states to advocate her admission into the Union in 1803. This fact is clearly brought out by the speech of the governor of Ohio at the inauguration of work on the Ohio canal on the Fourth of July, 1825. The central figure of this assemblage was Governor De Witt Clinton of New York, who, fresh from the completion of his great Erie canal, was there to turn the first spadeful of earth in this important undertaking. Addressing him, Governor Morrow said: 'In no small degree, owing to your espousal as a senator in Congress of her cause, did Ohio gain admission to the Union.' The Erie canal and the great canal system of Ohio, completed in 1842, were of inestimable benefit, each to the other. Connected by Lake Erie, they established a continuous waterway, by which the products of the Buckeye state were transported to New York, opening to her farmers and merchants her vast territory and markets, elevating her, through New York's aid, to a position among the states of the Union of which her sons have ever since been justly proud.

"In view of the timely support which New York has rendered in these three instances, it is not surprising that Ohio has been able in every national Republican convention, except one, since the close of the Civil War, to name as candidate for President of the United States a man born or living within her territory. Some men achieve greatness, some have greatness thrust upon them, and some are born in Ohio!

"The people of the Flowery Kingdom express the morning salutation 'O-h-i-o.' Should not, then, the neighboring inhabitants of the islands of the Philippine archipelago hail the protection of the flag of a nation whose President combines a suggestion of both the Flowery and Celestial Kingdoms in his home, Ohio and Canton? As our ever growing commerce knocks at the door of the unlimited trade of the Orient, may we not find an omen in the fact that the Yankees of the East greet one another by the name of our President's native state? Under the wise and progressive foreign policy now proclaimed and rapidly expanding under the master hand of our national government, the day will soon dawn when in place of the formal greeting 'O-h-i-o' the words 'United States of America' will become the open sesame throughout those lands whose peaceful conquest we shall yet achieve.

"With sincere and mighty acclaim do the people of this great commercial metropolis of the nation welcome the President under whose administration all the forty-five gems in Columbia's diadem have become more resplendent than ever, polished by the attrition of patriotic rivalry in all parts of our common country, and now embellished by the Pearl of the Antilles and freshly adorned by the jewels of the Orient. Since March 4, 1897, our country has become a world power, so that to-day the man who occupies the place of President of the United States exercises a more potent influence than any ruler among men."

Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland, followed Mr. Woodruff, his toast being "The Man of the Hour." He said:

"The members of this Society have reasons for congratulation. We are living in a most auspicious time. Since I last had the honor of addressing you (only two short years ago) events the most momentous and deeds the most heroic have happened and been wrought. Civilization has made a long march forward, and in this grand advance that branch of the dominant, sturdy Anglo-Saxon race to which we belong has had the right of the line. When the history of this scant but epoch making interval is fully written, its pages will be fairly crammed with records of achievements in statesmanship, in diplomacy, in battle, on sea and land, and in devotion, the bare and unadorned recitals of which will quicken the pulses of all true Americans, lift their patriotic ideals, and fill their hearts with gratitude and pride that the good God has given them, if only by right of birth, or even by adoption, a share in the shining glory of which the flag they love is the fitting and lustrous emblem. We cannot, indeed, all be McKinleys, or Deweys, or Sampsons, or Wainwrights, or Lawtons, of fragrant memory; or Mileses, or Shafter, or Garretsons, or gallant old 'Joe' Wheelers, or indomitable and irresistible 'Teddies.' We may not even be numbered among the thousands and thousands of others who, in legislative halls, in administrative offices, in diplomatic fields, in the crash of battle, or in other acts of patriotic sacrifice, have done so much, not only for the ultimate adding of new stars to the flag, but in making the old stars shine so much the more brilliantly; but, at any rate, we are all Americans; and, provided only we 'set aside every weight—like Pettigrew or Atkinson, for instance—and the sins—of timidity and faint heartedness—which do so easily beset us,' and 'run with patience the race set before us,' and 'press forward toward the prize of our high calling,' then there will be 'an abundant and exceeding weight of glory' for all of us in this.

"But the members of this Society have a peculiar and distinctive reason for congratulation to-night, for of all the heroes born of this epoch of emergency, of trial and promise, a 'simple but great one' from the state of Ohio is the most conspicuous and the most illustrious, and he is our honored guest this evening. Our President is not only the first citizen of the Republic by right of office, but by right of accomplishment. He leads, not merely because he has his place, but because he fills it. The commanding officer of any army, even though not on the firing line, is nevertheless entitled to the largest measure of credit for success, as there will be visited upon him the largest measure of censure for failure. Upon the shoulders of him whose brain conceives and whose voice directs rests the most crushing burden of responsibility, and upon his brow, if all goes well, should shine the brightest crown. That was indeed an unequalled performance of the great admiral. Unequalled, because by his genius and courage he turned the most dismal and foreboding prophecies into glorious realities. Unequalled, not only for what he did, but for what he dared. Unequalled also for what he gained for his country, not only in prestige, but in possessions. But who selected the great sailor? Who placed him upon the bridge of the Olympia? Who inspired the historic order, which Dewey so exactly and completely obeyed, to 'seek out the enemy's fleet and destroy it'? Our guest did all this. Was there ever anything finer in song or story than that mad rush of Wood and Roosevelt and their gallant Rough Riders and rougher walkers and runners and fighters up the bullet-swept side of San Juan hill? But who unleashed these fearless and invincible dogs of war? Who pointed out their quarry to them and set them on? Their commander-in-chief did that. A thousand and ten thousand cheers for brave little old 'Joe' Wheeler, who led his men up the slope of El Caney and planted the flag he had fought against in his green youth, but risked his life for in his ripe old age, on the blood smeared summit! But who gave him the chance to rewrite his name on history's page in unquenchable and patriotic flame? Who laid a soft and tactful hand on old sores and healed them forever? Who dropped the sweet and scented flowers of a wise and patriotic forgetfulness on the unsightly graves of dead issues and so adorned them? It was the president of this now reunited Republic who did all that.

"Those were perfectly splendid announcements which Sampson and Schley and their great captains not only made, but proved to the world a year ago last July. They were to the effect, you remember, that there was room on the top of Cuban waters for only one of two hostile fleets, while there was room and to spare at the bottom for all the ships which Spain might see fit to send there; and also that if ever again a warship were blown up in Havana harbor by an external cause it would not be a United States warship. Those were splendid announcements, and the proof that was furnished in support of them on that warm July day was simply overwhelming. But who was it stood like a rock against the numberless demands of timid people living on the Atlantic coast, especially in Boston and in its vicinity, that some of Sampson's battleships and cruisers should be taken away from their essential work at Santiago and sent North to protect them? Who was it that was responsible for the order starting the bulldog of the United States navy on her memorable and unequalled trip around the world, not in eighty, but in less than forty days, in order that she might smite the Colon with one of her railroad trains? Who was it that inspired energy in every subordinate and sent life pulsing through every department, so that supplies were promptly furnished and intelligence quickly given? Who, in that time of strain, worked twenty-eight hours out of the twenty-four? The Commander-in-Chief of the Navy of the United States did that. When Otis fires the sunset gun at Manila and the flag comes down, Merritt salutes the rising sun at Governor's Island, and the flag runs up; so that there is never a minute now in the twenty-four hours when Old Glory is not fluttering somewhere in the breeze and over territory owned and controlled by the United States, too. So that it has happened, under the administration of our President, that England no longer has a monopoly of the drumbeat heard around the world.

"But who is responsible for keeping the flag afloat in those far distant possessions? A word from him would have brought it down, but he has kept it flying in spite of an opposition sometimes narrow and sometimes traitorous, but always bitter. It was a broad and fearless statesmanship which sent out a commission to the Philippines composed of men who at the outset were opposed to the policy of the administration, but who, after an opportunity of investigation, have become its most enthusiastic supporters. But, indeed, all Americans who have visited Manila, who, even though like Balaam of old, 'went out to curse the people of the Lord, have returned to bless them.' What Lincoln was to Grant and Sherman and Sheridan, to Farragut and Foote, McKinley has been to Miles and Merritt and Otis and Shafter, to Dewey and Sampson, and when one has said this, one has exhausted all eulogy and bankrupted all applause.

"I have at home a picture, of which I am very fond. It is a picture of the Triumvirate of American immortals. Under their heads in bas-relief are written these words:

"Washington, Father of the Republic."

"Lincoln, the Savior of the Republic."

"Grant, the Guardian of the Republic."

"But the picture is now incomplete, for the triumvirate has become a quartet. Another face should be inclosed within the frame, and under it should be written, 'McKinley, the Pathfinder of the Republic.' He has blazed out a new pathway for American commerce and American enterprise; a new pathway for civilization, for progress, for development and for enlightenment. Under the broad and therefore expanding and stimulating policy of this administration, what a future is spread out before us! What great things may the American people not accomplish, not only for themselves, but for the cause of civilization and progress! They will have an army, not too large, but large enough to insure order in every inch of territory over which the Stars and Stripes floats, however distant, and to protect our borders, however widely extended, from foreign aggression. They will have a navy large enough and powerful enough to protect an ever expanding and ever growing American commerce. Under the stimulus of a wise and equitable shipping law this commerce will be carried in American bottoms, which will sail through an American canal connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific. This commerce, in an ever increasing and growing volume, will enter the doors of China, which this administration have opened, and, as commerce follows the flag, so will justice and equal rights and enlightenment and progress flourish wherever that flag floats.

“Last fall, on the steps of the Capitol at Washington, the President of the Republic handed to the admiral of the United States navy a sword which the representatives of all the people had unanimously voted him in recognition of his signal services. The diamonds in its hilt, flashing in the sunlight of that autumn day, glistened like the tears of pride and gratitude which filled the eyes of all the people when they got the great news from Manila. The pure gold of its scabbard was emblematic of the shining valor of the great sailor, and also of the purity of his patriotism. Its keen blade brought to mind the hard blows he had struck for his country in the shock of battle and the keen thrusts he had made for her in the nicer contests of diplomacy. ‘Admiral,’ said the President, as he handed him this historic sword, while sixty thousand of his approving countrymen looked on; ‘Admiral, there was no flaw in your victory; there must be no faltering in maintaining it.’ I desire to-night to paraphrase a little that notable utterance. Mr. President, there has been no flaw in the policy of your administration, and there must be—there shall be—no faltering in maintaining it. I believe that there will not be, for I am sure that history can never truthfully record that He, who is not only the God of Battles, but of Peace, the God of Civilization, the God of Development, the God of Progress and the God of Wisdom, could ever have fruitlessly and in vain offered these golden opportunities to the American people. I, for one, do not believe that the priceless and lustrous pearls of Puerto Rico, of Hawaii and of the Philippines have been cast before swine.”

Governor Nash spoke on the toast, “The Governor of Ohio,” and in part said:

“We have many things in Ohio to be proud of—splendid citizenships, growth and prosperity—but to-night we are the proudest of the people from our state who have helped build up this great state. Ohio is prosperous because it is laid on foundations firm and solid. When the great Northwest was settled it was promised that the states carved out of it should forever remain in the American confederation, and those five states when the Union was threatened gave more than one-third of all the men that defended it. Among these warriors, and the greatest, were Grant, Sherman and Sheridan.

“There have been thirty-eight governors of Ohio, and, of course, it is not possible for me to speak of them. It is fitting, however, that I mention the first—the governor of the Northwest territory, General Arthur St. Clair. He was born in Scotland, and served in the English army with Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham before Quebec; he was with Washington at Trenton and Morristown. So when the American settlers had pushed westward it was well that this gallant officer of Washington's should be sent to govern over them.

“In later years there are two governors especially worthy of mention—Rutherford B. Hayes and William McKinley, Presidents of the United States. We are proud of our state, because it is our own. But we of Ohio, wherever we are, remember it is but one of forty-five which comprise this Union. We have a greater and broader pride for the nation than ever for our dearly cherished native state.”

“Honorary Members,” ex-Governor Campbell's toast, was often broken into by applause and laughter. The speaker said:

“I have heard from one president, one vice-president, one governor, one colonel, and now you must listen to an everyday private from the ranks, and the only Democrat among them all.

“I recall distinctly the first banquet of the Society—it must be fifteen years now, or fourteen. I have been here seven, eight, and this makes the ninth time in all. I have spoken on Governor Nash's toast, when as the chief executive of the state, the prerogative was mine; also to the state itself, but, as Webster said of Massachusetts, Ohio needs no encomiums.

“Some years ago, when, as now, I represented no one but myself, I said about Hawaii that perhaps I should not live to see the time, but my children would, when not only the islands to the west of us, but those to the east of us, should be governed, covered and controlled by the flag of the United States. Well, it has all come around a little too soon. The last time my toast was the nearest to my heart of all those that preceded it. I was introduced as having served as a boy in the United States navy. It is my proud boast and right to say that that is the greatest honor that can come to a man. The one on my right will agree with me when I contend that when he lays down his great honors he will regard the greatest privilege of his life, the right to look an old soldier of the Republic in the face and call him comrade. Now, about the honorary members of the Ohio Society. This Society has been sparing in conferring such titles, for I myself am one, and so am constrained to think so. There are six in number. Two have passed on to the great majority—William T. Sherman and Allen G. Thurman. I have not in this presence to speak of these men. But I must say that the man whose brilliancy of intellect, whose capacity and farseeing power had most to do with the success of the Union army was William T. Sherman. He used to say, ‘I have read more than Grant; I know more than Grant, but I'm scared to death at what I can't see the rebels doing.’

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“As to William McKinley, you have heard Colonel Hoyt and you would not have me outdo him in praise. I have not the ability, any way, though I do have the inclination. With a great deal Mr. McKinley has said I agree heartily, but one thing I want him to do. For myself, I want all these islands. I want the Philippines, and Porto Rico, and Cuba also, if we can get her. And I want an artificial waterway between them, without asking the consent of any nation whatever.”

When Governor Roosevelt was introduced he was enthusiastically received, and amid the cheers voices coupled the names of McKinley and Roosevelt in a manner that was significant. The governor said:

“Gentlemen of the Ohio Society, and Mr. President, the guest of the evening: I have a certain right to come before the Ohio Society, although not an honorary member, but because I have served under one acting and one honorary member.

“You know the old saying that a typical New Yorker is a man born out West of New England parents. We elected such a typical New Yorker mayor of this city once, and I may add that he showed himself by all odds the best mayor this city has had for a generation, and he put me in to administer the Police Department, which I administered according to the Ohio idea. I am not certain that New York enjoyed it, but I know it did a lot of good.

“I was graduated from Mayor Strong to serving under the man from Ohio, whom we all gather to honor, the President of the United States. I am not here to-night to speak for the state of New York; that toast has been responded to with the utmost eloquence and ability by my colleague, Lieutenant-Governor Woodruff.

“But I speak not to you, but on your behalf; not to you as men coming from Ohio, but for you as men who dwell in New York city, in pledging the support of the great city of New York to the president, who is not the president of Ohio or of New York, but of the entire American Republic.

“It has been well said to-night that you represent, Mr. President, the reunited America, in deed as well as in name. I see in the audience here men of Virginia and of South Carolina who fought valiantly for what they called the right as they saw it on the other side in the civil war, and whose sons fought, when you were commander-in-chief, no less valiantly for the flag of the United States.

“We are proud of our state, but we are prouder still of the nation of which our state is a part. We recognize the fact that this state can grow and prosper only as the nation grows and prospers. We recognize the fact that the welfare of the East is bound up with the welfare of the West.

“Now it was a good thing for us to gather here to-night to honor ourselves in honoring the President of the United States, who has borne a greater burden by far than any President has borne since the days when Lincoln worked and suffered for the people and laid down his life that the flag that had been torn asunder might once more be made whole and without a seam.

“It is good for us to meet here to honor him, but it is better that we should meet here and resolve that the principles for which he stood shall prevail in the future. Woe to us if we pay a seeming loyalty that we do not make good by deeds.

“We have no right to glory in what has been done in the three years that have elapsed since President McKinley went to Washington unless we are determined that the future shall not belie the past and that those three years shall be but the earnest of what is to come. They have been three great years.

“We have heard complaint, we have heard cavil. Some of the complaint we can afford to disregard—the complaint of the weakling and of the man who would like to be a traitor, only he has not got the red blood in his veins; the complaint of the man who has never done aught but criticise, and who, therefore, cannot understand the labor that comes upon him who actually does the mighty work.

“We answer by asking them to look at what has been done as history will look at it. President McKinley came into the high office that he now holds—into the highest office that the civilized world can give—to find this nation painfully groping in the darkest path that it has had to tread within the memory of the present generation.

“He came pledged to uphold the national interest at home and the national honor abroad, and the pledge has been kept in letter and spirit down to the last item that could be demanded. Now, if you approve of the pledge being kept, see that we go on keeping it.

“If you approve of economic policies that have produced a prosperity which we now have, if you approve of the financial policy that has given us a currency the honesty of which cannot be questioned, if you approve of the foreign policy that has put the American flag where it has never been put before, then stand by President McKinley in the future as you have stood by him in the past.

“As the President has well said, we did not seek the issues, we did not make the issues, but we faced them when made. The nation was brought face to face with great problems, and under the leadership of President McKinley it solved them.

“Under his leadership, as Colonel Hoyt has said, we fought to the conclusion the most righteous foreign war that has been fought by any nation within the memory of any man living, and then, as a result of that war, we found ourselves face to face with other problems. We could not help solving the problems. All we could decide was whether we would solve them well or ill.

“Remember that. There was no chance of avoiding them. We had to meet them; we could meet them badly or we could meet them in the right spirit. Those were the only alternatives open to us. Woe to us as a nation, woe to our children and our children’s children if we turn back from the path of honor which we have begun to tread under President McKinley.

“Some other time, my friends, I shall speak to you, I trust, not merely as members of the Ohio Society, but as citizens of New York, to ask your aid in helping solve the problems that confront us in this state, the problems that when they have been reduced to the last analysis are the problems of administering the government with honesty and common sense.

‘Now, however, I speak to you less as New Yorkers than as Americans, and I ask you to stand with me when I say to you this evening that New York stands this year as it stood four years ago, that it stands for the principle which the state of Ohio has come to symbolize, that it stands for the economic policies that mean honesty in business and prosperity through America at home, and that it stands by President McKinley as amid infinite difficulties.

“With infinite toil and labor he works for the solution of the difficulties that confront us abroad, so that the flag of the United States, where it has once been raised shall symbolize, not only the greatness of this country, but the material well being of the islands by the tropic seas, which fell to us because we wrested them from the cruel might of Spain.”

At the conclusion of the governor’s speech the members tendered an ovation to the President and to Governor Roosevelt, and then, gathering up their souvenirs and their menu cards, plentifully decorated with pictures of buck-eyes and ’coon skins, they went out into the frosty night.

At the meeting of March 12th President Southard announced the receipt of a letter from President McKinley, expressing his appreciation of the banquet given in his honor. A social entertainment, designated as an “Ohio Night,” was given at the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of April 23d. A vaudeville programme was presented, followed by an informal dance and supper. The matter was in the hands of the entertainment committee, Judge Higley, chairman, who were assisted by a large number of members constituting a reception committee. The programme presented was as follows:

A special meeting of the Society was called for November 2, 1900, at No. 71 Broadway, at the office of General Swayne, to make arrangements for attending the funeral of a former president of the Society, Hon. William L. Strong, ex-mayor of New York city. This official notice was ordered sent to the members:

“To the Members of the Ohio Society: At a called meeting of the Society, held at No. 71 Broadway, this afternoon, the secretary of the Society was instructed to announce to the members that the funeral of the Hon. William L. Strong, formerly president of the Society, will take place at St. Thomas’ Church, corner Fifth avenue and Fifty-third street, on Monday, November 5, at 11 o’clock a.m. It was also considered that, in view of the high regard entertained by the Society for the deceased, it was doubtless the wish of every member of the Society to be present. The secretary was therefore instructed to announce that arrangements would be made for seating in a body those members who shall be present, and to request them, on arriving at the church, to ask to be shown to the seats assigned to the Society.

“WILLIAM H. BLYMER, Secretary.”

“New York, November 2, 1900.

At a later meeting the following gentlemen were named as a committee to prepare a memorial in honor of the memory of the late mayor: Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Gen. Anson G. McCook, A. D. Juilliard, A. J. C. Foyé, George Follett, Milton I. Southard.

The nominating committee selected in October consisted of the following gentlemen: George Follett, A. D. Houston, E. L. Prentiss, George S. Hayes, A. W. Gilmore, E. P. Merser, Frank N. Dowler. On November 12th they reported the following ticket: President, Milton I. Southard; vice-presidents, Andrew J. C. Foyé, George E. Armstrong, Thomas H. Wheeler, Warren Higley, Colgate Hoyt; secretary, Albert F. Hagar; recording secretary, Charles W. Morris; treasurer, Leander H. Crall; trustees, Samuel H. Parsons, James G. Newcomb, Emerson McMillin. This ticket was unanimously ratified by the Society. At the December meeting President Southard announced the following committees: Literature and art, Charles H. Neihaus, Albert Shaw, Alex. Doyle, Landon S. Thompson, Daniel C. Beard; entertainment, Warren Higley, Putnam Bradlee Strong, Andrew Ernest Foyé, Henry C. Plimpton, William S. Hawk; library, William Ford Upson, Mahlon Chance, W. H. Caldwell, L. D. Morrison, F. M. Applegate; auditing, Richard J. Chard, Andrew Linn, David H. Bates, Frank L. Sheldon, Walstein F. Douthirt.

At this meeting Judge Higley suggested that a special meeting be held some time the latter part of January, to which should be invited the ladies of the Society, “and thus inaugurate in the present rooms a series of delightful entertainments, such as the Society had enjoyed at their rooms on Fifth avenue, and in which the majority of the members present had never had the pleasure of participating.”

Mr. Chance suggested that the library committee have a formal meeting some time before the next regular meeting, and among other things they might take the opportunity to thank the gentlemen who had raised at Mansfield, Ohio, the monument to “Johnny Appleseed,” that old historic as well as extremely useful figure in the early history of Ohio, the first nurseryman. President Southard gave an interesting account of the life of “Johnny Appleseed,” and stated that the gentleman who gave the monument was Martin Bushnell, of Mansfield, O. Mr. Chance moved that a committee of five be appointed to draft suitable resolutions thanking Mr. Bushnell for the erection of this monument and the spirit which prompted it, and the appreciation of the Ohio Society, and that that resolution be appropriately endorsed and sent to him. The proposition was approved.

The chair appointed Mr. Chance and the other members of the library committee to draft these resolutions. President Southard read a letter from the Ohio Society of California, extending an invitation to this Society as a body or individually to attend the launching of the battleship "Ohio," at the Union Iron Works in San Francisco, in April.

L. D. Clarke was elected chairman of the governing board for the ensuing year. A. J. C. Foyé, Francis B. Stedman and Rollin M. Morgan were elected as the house committee. It was moved that a committee, consisting of the president and treasurer, be appointed, with power, to confer together and arrange for either depositing on interest or investing such amount of the money of the Society on hand as the committee deemed appropriate. Carried.

1901-1902

WHEN the Society commenced another year's record, on January 14, 1901, Judge Higley moved the appointment of a committee of fifteen, of which General Burnett should be chairman, with power to fix a date and arrange a programme for the next annual banquet, and with power to add to their number such other members of the Society as they might deem best for the interest of the banquet. The entertainment committee had prepared a special programme for the evening, which was then presented, as follows:

- Banjo selection—"Ameer March," . . . Herbert
Brooks and Denton.
- Humorous song—"You Can't Keep a Good Man Down."
Dan W. Quinn.
- Banjo selection—"Salome," . . . Loraine
Brooks and Denton.
- Humorous song—"In Old Ben Franklin's Day."
Dan W. Quinn.
- Banjo selections—(a) "La Cinquantaïne," . . . Gabriel
(b) "Medley of Popular Airs."
Brooks and Denton.
- Humorous songs—(a) "Dem Goo-Goo Eyes."
(b) "I Want to Go To-'morrow."
Accompanist—Frank P. Banta.

The suggestion of Judge Higley, made some time before, bore fruit in the early days of the year. The following announcement indicated the pleasures in store for those who accepted the hospitalities of the Society on the evening named:

"On Monday evening, January 28, 1901, the Society will give an informal 'Ladies' Night' at its rooms in the Waldorf-Astoria, at which a delightful programme will be rendered by distinguished Ohioans. Among those who will take part in the entertainment are Mrs. Ida Eckert-Lawrence, the distinguished authoress, of Toledo, Ohio; Mrs. Eliza Archard Conner, the well-known writer and speaker, formerly of Cincinnati, Ohio, and lately returned from extensive travels abroad; Miss Clara Bernetta, a native of Cincinnati, Ohio, with a European training for the operatic stage, will delight the audience with song, her sister being the accompanist. The ladies are most cordially invited to attend. The exercises will begin at 8.15 o'clock. A collation will be served after the literary exercises. It is sincerely hoped that the members generally will attend with their families, and enjoy again a genuine 'Ohio Ladies' Night' at the rooms of the Society.

"MILTON I. SOUTHARD, President."

"ALBERT F. HAGAR, Secretary."

The occasion was all that was promised. The following ample programme was presented:

Reading—(a) "Sweetheart of Mine."

(b) "I'll Keep the Old Horse Shod."

Mrs. Ida Eckert-Lawrence.

Solo, Brindisi, "Lucrezia Borgia," . . . Donizetti

Miss Clara Bernetta.

Reading—(a) "Lines to a Sea Gull."

(b) "Pay'in the Mortgage."

Mrs. Ida Eckert-Lawrence.

(b) "Sleep on Little Boy."

(c) "Sketches at Dawn."

Mrs. Ida Eckert-Lawrence.

Accompanist—Mr. Robert Colston Young.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

At a later meeting, Judge Higley proposed a vote of thanks to the several parties who had furnished this entertainment. He stated that it demonstrated the fact that the present rooms were ample to accommodate any function more pleasantly than in a more formal way at some other place.

In the meeting of March 11th Mr. Foyé reported for the committee that a banquet room had been secured for the evening of Saturday, March 30th. Colgate Hoyt gave an interesting account of the trip to Washington of President Southard, Mr. Mather and himself as representatives of the banquet committee in an endeavor to secure the presence thereat of Secretary of State Hay and other prominent gentlemen.

The fifteenth annual banquet, held in the large ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of March 30, 1901, partook of the nature of a testimonial to Hon. George K. Nash, governor of Ohio, who was the chief guest of the evening. About a hundred and fifty members of the Society sat at round tables, and nearly as many ladies appeared in the balconies near the close of the feast and remained to listen to the speeches. President Milton I. Southard presided at the guests' table, having Governor Nash at his right and Governor George P. McLean, of Connecticut, at his left. Others at the guests' table were General Joseph Wheeler, Assistant Attorney-General James M. Beck, John D. Crimmins, Robert H. Turle, James Lindsay Gordon, William W. Baldwin, Charles E. Burke, John W. Vrooman and Mornay Williams.

A large American flag behind the guests' table was the only decoration of the dining hall. The cover of the menu card represented a cluster of buckeyes, and on cream plated paper were photogravures of all the governors of Ohio from 1788 to that present time. The ices were served in boxes representing "prairie schooners," the vehicles used by immigrants in ante-railroad days, when Ohio was the Eldorado of the settler.

The following gentlemen had the banquet in charge: Banquet committee, Henry L. Burnett, chairman; John J. McCook, William L. Brown, Samuel Thomas, Whitelaw Reid, Leander H. Crall, John D. Archbold, Warren Higley, Emerson McMillin, William S. Hawk, Louis D. Clarke, Rollin M. Morgan, Richard J. Chard, Wager Swayne, Milton I. Southard, Anson G. McCook, Colgate Hoyt, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H. Wheeler, David Homer Bates, Evarts L. Prentiss, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Raymond C. Penfield, Samuel H. Parsons, Flamen Ball Candler, Albert F. Hagar, secretary; reception committee, Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; Lowell M. Palmer, David Homer Bates, Jr., H. Q. French, DeFrees Critten, Francis B. Stedman, Samuel McMillan, James G. Newcomb, William H. Caldwell, Emory A. Stedman, Wade Chance, Rush Taggart, L. D. Morrison, Warner Ells, George F. Randolph, Walter S. Sullivan, Francis X. Butler, William H. Blymyer, R. W. OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Letters of regret were received from several prominent men who were born in Ohio, and Samuel L. Clemens sent the following quaint letter, dated from his home, in West Tenth street:

“ To the Ohio Society, Greeting.

“ I have at this moment received a very kind invitation (eleven days old) from Mr. Southard, president, and a like one (ten days old) from Mr. Bryant, president of the Press Club. I thank the Society cordially for the compliment of its invitation, although I am booked elsewhere and cannot come. But, oh! I should like to know the name of the lightning express by which they were forwarded, for I owe a friend a dozen of chickens. I believe it will be cheaper to send eggs instead, and let them develop on the road.

“ Sincerely yours,

“ MARK TWAIN.”

In his opening address President Southard said:

“ Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: It gives me great pleasure to greet you this evening. We have assembled according to our yearly custom to commemorate our native state. And it is a fitting and pleasant incident that we have with us as our guest of honor the Governor of Ohio. We extend to him our hearty salutations and the freedom of the Society. I may not betray any confidence by telling you that the first time the Governor and I met we were both engaged as prosecuting attorneys of adjoining counties in railroading the criminal classes into states prison. His zeal was very great, and many a culprit felt his heavy hand, but I have no doubt that he was then looking forward to the day when he should become governor and thus hold the pardoning power and be enabled to temper justice with mercy.

“ It is especially gratifying to be honored by the presence of the Governor of Connecticut, whose citizens contributed so much to the early settlement of Ohio.

“ To our other distinguished guests we make our grateful acknowledgements. We are indebted to the ladies for the brightness which their presence brings. It may not be prudent to say it, but we could not do without them. It has been a year since they greeted us at a like function, which seems a long time; and they are each a year older, which seems incredible.

“ I scarcely need tell our visiting friends from Ohio that the state still has charms for those of us who have been lured to this great metropolis as a place of abode. While a generous welcome has made us feel at home here, we cannot forget the past. Loyalty to New York, however, is not inconsistent with filial attachment to Ohio. The skies may change, but not the mind, and so we go back in fancy to Ohio; to the visions of her broad valleys; her verdured hills; her limpid streams; her beautiful rivers and her myriad associations. Those, indeed, were halcyon days, when her many sons and daughters in the buoyancy of hope were as happy as the favored few at Athens in the golden era of Greece, of whom it was said, 'in the soft air, on the bright plain, life for a few was all a festival.'

"As you know, Ohio was the first born of the five great states, carved out of the famous Northwest Territory. Her origin is notable and her development wondrous. But I do not claim for her all the glories. I have learned from attendance on banquets of the societies of other states and sections that some great deeds have been wrought elsewhere.

"If it were not for my innate modesty, however, I might picture for Ohio a growth, intellectual, moral and material that would challenge the admiration or provoke the envy of all, and yet keep strictly within the bounds of authentic history. It is true that she has no signers of the Declaration of Independence or of the constitution, nor any names on the roster of the gallant officers, soldiers and sailors of the revolution. And why? Simply because she then had none to sign or enroll. But in after time her sons came and intuitively imbibed the heroic spirit of the fathers of the Republic. They have ever since kept the faith and have crowned their state and country in imperishable honor by their heroic deeds."

President Southard then briefly sketched the steps taken for the formation of that famous territory, out of which so many commonwealths have been carved, and of them he said: "The population of the five states within its borders is over 15,000,000, equal to the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain in 1850, and about one-fifth of the whole United States at the present time. And their wealth and material resources are commensurate with their great area and population. But this is not all. There are other considerations which are of higher importance, and which appeal far more to the pride of the past and the hopes of the future. They spring out of the character of the institutions which were here established." He then eloquently discussed the famous ordinance of 1787. In conclusion he said: "The Northwest Territory was the first to be organized in our national history, and the first thought of the fathers was to dedicate it to liberty. Since then our territorial growth has been continuous. In the course of events our domain has been extended from a fringe along the Atlantic coast to the shores of the Pacific and recently far beyond to the distant islands of the sea. Whether we have gone too far or yet not far enough is, at present, a much mooted question. The answer must be found in our ability to organize the government of alien peoples in harmony with our free institutions, for it is the character of our rule, and not the exhibition of our power, that must determine the wisdom of such acquisition. However we may differ, therefore, about the recent or further extension of the boundaries of our country, we should all agree that wherever we go we should sacredly maintain and apply the wholesome principle of free government with all limitations of official authority. I mean that we should strenuously preserve not only the form but the soul of our institutions and daily accustom ourselves to worship the substance and not the shadow of freedom.

“Holding fast to these high ideals and aspirations it will be difficult indeed to ever strand our ship of state on the reefs or shoals of imperial misrule. But the love of gain, the pride of dominion, the seductions of wealth and the habit of indifference to civic duty, which are now dominant in our country, have led to the downfall of other nations in other times. With all our hopefulness, therefore—and we are hopeful beyond measure—we must not forget the wise though familiar maxim that ‘eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,’ and always and everywhere, not excepting even this, the freest of nations. And so, exercising this vigilance, if we go astray, let us retrace our steps; if we commit errors, let us rectify them; if we become too slothful, let us hasten on; if overfast, let us retard our movement, and thus constantly reform ourselves, always keeping in mind the honor of our country and the welfare of all mankind.”

When Governor Nash was presented as the next speaker, he received the vociferous welcome which governors of Ohio usually get at the annual dinners of the Ohio Society. He began his speech with the statement that the people of Ohio feel interest and pride in the successes of men from the Buckeye state in other states. He said:

“Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Society of Ohio: I greatly appreciate the courtesy and kindness which you have shown me to-night. I do not look upon this compliment as personal to myself. It comes, I think, from a desire on your part to show the love which you have for your former home.

“I beg to assure you that you have not been forgotten by your old friends, neighbors and fellow-citizens in the Buckeye state. We have watched with great interest your efforts in the work of building up the great city of New York. You have been important factors in her commercial, financial, professional, educational and artistic life. The people at home are rejoiced at your triumphs.

“I know that it will rejoice your hearts to be assured that we have been getting along fairly well at home. In other states of the Union there are to-day more than one million of inhabitants who were born in Ohio. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, we have constantly increased in population.

“Our mercantile, manufacturing, mining, financial and railway interests have constantly increased in volume and strength. In the meantime our colleges, schools and universities have grown in numbers and attendance. We are here to-night as men and women through whose veins flow the same ancestral blood, having a sort of heart-to-heart talk.

“It is but natural that we should recall the prosperity which we know attends our kinsfolk. Whenever fortune transplants them to other fields they are equally loyal to the states of their adoption. In the new home her best interests and her prosperity become objects of their affection and receive their zealous support. For this reason they are always the best citizens wherever they may be found.

“In closing, I thank you for your very great kindness, and bespeak for the Ohio Society of New York a very brilliant future.”

Governor McLean was then introduced. In part he said:

“Ohio quickly takes from Virginia the right of being called ‘the mother of presidents.’ Under those circumstances Connecticut says: ‘Thank God for giving us such a daughter.’ And when Ohio gives us such a president as William McKinley Connecticut says: ‘Thank God who gave us such a grandson.’”

After reviewing the early history of his state, Governor McLean continued by saying: “The trouble is that we of the present generation do not appreciate the blessings of the present. The fact remains that the inhabitant of the smallest village of the United States has better lights, better roads to travel, better neighbors and a better wife than the richest man fifty years ago. Dewey was sent to sink the Spanish fleet at Manila, and he did it. Funston was sent to capture Aguinaldo, and he did it. If we set Aguinaldo free and make him a governor, as some of the papers have suggested, we would set an example which would take out of the dictionary of war the words reprisal and revenge. Our mission is one of mercy, and not of conquest.”

Governor McLean then referred briefly to the reform movement in New York City. “There are few places,” he said, “which are always in a process of reform and still always growing worse.”

General Wheeler was next introduced, and in part said:

“There has been something said about our possessions in the Far East. Any one who has been taking any note of our history must have come to the conclusion that this is only the destiny of our race. Civilization has always been traveling westward. Four thousand years ago the centre of civilization was in Asia. Then this centre was shifted to Greece, and later to this country. We are now passing it on across the Pacific Ocean.

“Wherever the flag goes the hearts of the American people will follow. We have striven to be at peace with all the world, but when forced into war the whole nation will put the stamp of approval on the victories won by its armies. So powerful is this nation to-day that a word from the Executive Mansion in Washington has stopped the march of mighty Germany's armies in China."

The last speaker was Assistant District Attorney James Lindsay Gordon, who spoke on "Old Virginia."

At the session of April 8th, General Burnett spoke of the success of the banquet under the circumstances of the late start, and said it was his intention to advocate having all future banquets earlier in the season. President Southard suggested having something in honor of the ladies at the meeting in May. Mr. Hoyt asked that the matter be referred to the entertainment committee. Mr. Foyé suggested that an informal dinner, complimentary to the members, be held at the Manhattan, and that the ladies be invited.

In accordance with these suggestions, the gathering of May 14th took the form of a dinner in honor of the ladies of the Society, a large attendance being present. After the routine business had been transacted, President Southard welcomed the members and their guests in a few well chosen words, and stated that although there were no set speeches arranged, he would take the liberty of calling upon Father Malone, who responded in a short talk, which was in itself an oratorical gem, paying a high tribute to the noble women of Ohio, and ascribing to them much of the greatness of the state inasmuch as they had made the men what they were. President Southard then called upon Judge Higley, who made a few remarks in his usual happy manner, and called on General Burnett, who responded only as General Burnett can. Mr. Gordon, of Virginia, the next and last speaker, closed the evening's enjoyment with a few impromptu, but none the less eloquent remarks, in which he spoke of the ties of blood and kindred which cemented together the sons and daughters of Ohio and the Old Dominion. The meeting then adjourned. The entertainment committee having provided for an informal dance, the balance of the evening was passed in that manner.

The meeting of October 14th was one of deep sadness, devoted as it was to the memory of the late President McKinley. The president announced that he had named the following gentlemen to represent the Society at the funeral: Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Caleb B. Wick, David Robinson, Samuel McMillen, Henry B. Root and Samuel Mather.

The following committee on memorial resolutions to President McKinley was also announced: Gen. Wager Swayne, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Leander H. Crall, Samuel H. Parsons, and Warren Higley. Judge Higley, of the committee, read the following resolutions, and on motion they were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York has personal occasion to mourn deeply the death of President McKinley. His membership with us, always recognized on both sides, his coming from the capital to be our honored guest at a recent annual banquet, and his words then spoken of such interest to the country; all these were exponents of how he shared the cordiality we cherish as a tie between ourselves.

“Resolved, That even our sense of loss of these things vanishes in presence of our greater sense of loss as citizens and fellow countrymen, as sharers in those priceless benefits of civil government at which the blow was aimed, and sharers also in those human feelings to which throughout the world this most inhuman murder has been so appalling.

“Resolved, That the shots which loosed the cords of life in our dead President opened to view a love which more than aught else that was in him, was himself, which murder could not change to hate, and which in one expression of its tenderness reminds us of the ‘Son, behold thy mother!’ which was spoken from the Cross. His sense of immortality met the approach of death with such a recognition of his God as snatched from death its sting and from the grave its victory. The nation and its people and the world are better for this knowledge of our late executive. This very exaltation of his place in human hearts and memories and among the glories of his country’s past gives prominence to things that marked its mutual recognition. The Society’s home henceforth will not be visited without some mention of that President of the United States, arising from the memories of him which cluster here.

“Resolved, That murder was sought to be done in him upon all civil government, that order and security might perish. To us, who are organized expressly to conserve that filial relation to one state which he shared with us, the memory of McKinley ought to be a legacy of impulse, changing by action to reality. It ought to bring more fully into view the meaning and exalted office of the state; and ought to move us as good citizens to give its welfare more of our devotion and a larger share of our activities.

“Resolved, That to set this duty on foot the president of this Society be authorized to appoint a committee of five to consider what we can do, and when prepared, to report to the Society.”

Judge Higley moved that the resolutions be spread in full on the minutes; that they be properly engrossed, signed by the president, attested by the secretary, and sent to the widow of our late President, and that Mr. Crall be appointed a committee to take charge of this matter. Carried.

At a meeting of the governing committee on November 9th a vote of thanks was tendered Leander H. Crall for the preparation of the beautiful memorial resolutions on the death of President McKinley. The purchase of an oil portrait of President Garfield was authorized.

The nominating committee, consisting of Warner Ells, George S. Hayes,

HON. GEORGE K. NASH
Governor of Ohio.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

F. X. Butler, Samuel H. Parsons, E. L. Prentiss, A. D. Houston and F. M. Applegate, presented to the meeting of November 11th the following officers for the ensuing year: President, Colgate Hoyt; Vice-presidents, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H. Wheeler, Warren Higley, David Homer Bates, Thomas Ewing, Jr.; Secretary, Albert F. Hagar; Recording secretary, Charles W. Morris; Treasurer, Leander H. Crall; Trustees, Rush Taggart, Flamen Ball Candler, Cass Gilbert.

President Southard read a letter from Leander H. Crall, the treasurer, stating that he had served the Society for thirteen years past, and now desired to lay down the care of office and retire from active participation in the management of the Society, and, therefore, declined to permit himself to be considered as a candidate for the office. On motion, Mr. Crall's letter was read and laid on the table.

A portrait of a late member, Dr. Cornelius N. Hoagland, of Brooklyn, was presented to the Society by his daughter, Miss Ella J. Hoagland. Mr. Hagar presented the portrait in a few well chosen words, telling of Dr. Hoagland's many benefactions to the city of Brooklyn, and his eminent qualities as a man and a citizen. A resolution of thanks for the portrait was adopted.

Judge Higley spoke about the formation of the "Ladies' Ohio Society," and moved that the use of our rooms be extended to these ladies for the meetings at such times as they may choose, not including evenings. The motion was carried.

The annual meeting for 1901 was once more held upon the historic evening of November 29th. It took the form of a dinner at the Manhattan Hotel. The nominating committee reported that as Mr. Crall could not be persuaded to withdraw his declination of the office of treasurer, they had substituted the name of Samuel H. Parsons. The chairman stated that if there was no objection the secretary would cast one ballot for the ticket as presented by the nominating committee. Objection to this course was made, and another ticket in opposition to that of the nominating committee was presented, as follows: Vice-presidents, Whitelaw Reid, Charles A. Moore, John J. McCook, George W. Perkins and A. D. Juilliard. Recording secretary, John J. Crawford. Trustees, Louis C. Weir, Rush Taggart and Frank Brainard; the following nominees on the regular ticket having no opposition: Colgate Hoyt for president, Albert F. Hagar for secretary, Samuel H. Parsons for treasurer and Rush Taggart for trustee. The nominations of the opposing ticket were seconded. The chair appointed Messrs. Stedman and Applegate as tellers.

A protest was read against the meeting on the ground that it was illegal and void because the notices had not been sent out ten days previous to the night of the election, as directed in the by-laws. This protest was signed by four members of the Society, and further stated that they would contest the right of the treasurer to receive or pay out moneys.

Secretary Hagar stated that the reason the notices were a day late was because Mr. Crall had declined after being nominated and a new man had to be found to fill his place, which took some little time. This protest was received by the chair and afterwards withdrawn.

It was moved and seconded that this meeting, called for the election of certain officers for the ensuing year, adjourn until the second Monday in December, at 8:30 p. m., in the evening, at the rooms of the club, and that a vote then be taken upon such gentlemen as are placed in nomination for the various offices.

The chair overruled the motion and decided that an election must be held this evening as prescribed by the constitution. An appeal was taken from the ruling of the chair and the ruling of the chair was sustained.

The chair then directed that a ballot be taken, resulting in the election of the entire ticket as named by the nominating committee. The entire number of votes cast was sixty, Messrs. Hoyt, Parsons, Hagar and Taggart receiving the full sixty votes cast. Of the other nominees on the regular ticket, the highest received forty-nine votes, the three lowest forty-four. On the opposition ticket the highest received sixteen, the lowest twelve.

President Southard spoke feelingly of the death of "our fellow member, President William McKinley," and read a letter as follows from Secretary Cortelyou, acknowledging the receipt of the memorial resolutions sent by the Ohio Society:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., November 21, 1901.

"Dear General Swayne:—In Mrs. McKinley's behalf I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your very kind letter of recent date, with accompanying resolutions, and to request you to convey to the Ohio Society of New York her deep appreciation of its cordial message of sympathy. Assuring you that this thoughtful remembrance is very comforting to Mrs. McKinley, and with an expression of her thanks to you for your courtesy and tender words of consolation, believe me,

"Very sincerely yours,

"GEO. B. CORTELYOU.

"Gen. Wager Swayne, New York."

President Southard also spoke of the cordial and loyal support extended to him by all the members of the Ohio Society during his term of office, and the pleasures he had derived therefrom, and in closing introduced Colgate Hoyt, the new president of the Ohio Society. Mr. Hoyt addressed the Society in his usual happy vein, sketching briefly the history of his predecessors in office, and mentioning the fact that with one exception they had all been generals, colonels and lawyers, and that while he himself had only attained the exalted rank of quartermaster sergeant, he would do all that within him lay to make his administration a success, and asked the support of the members to that end.

Judge Higley moved that the hearty thanks of the Society "be extended to our retiring president for the able and efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of his honorable and distinguished office." Mr. Hagar seconded this resolution in a few pleasant remarks, and it was carried unanimously by a rising vote.

Mr. Foyé offered the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Candler in a few remarks, and carried unanimously by a rising vote:

"WHEREAS, Mr. Leander H. Crall has voluntarily retired from the office of treasurer of the Society after thirteen years of service, marked with great ability and by scrupulous care and fidelity, therefore be it,

"Resolved, That the Society hereby expresses its sincere regrets at his retirement and extends to him its cordial thanks for his long and efficient services, with the well wishes of all for his health and happiness."

Louis D. Clarke presented the name of Secretary of State John Hay for honorary membership, to be voted for at the January meeting. Mr. Southard presented the name of Hon. George K. Nash for honorary membership, to be also voted for at the January meeting, these gentlemen taking the place as honorary members of those distinguished statesmen and sons of Ohio, ex-Presidents Benjamin Harrison and William McKinley, who had passed away since the last annual meeting. Mr. Stedman spoke of the faithful manner in which Louis D. Clarke, the retiring chairman of the governing board, had performed the duties of his office, and moved a vote of thanks to him, which motion was seconded and carried unanimously by a rising vote. Mr. Southard introduced the orator of the evening, Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland, who addressed the Society as he only can, giving many interesting and hitherto untold stories in the life of the late President McKinley. Rev. John Lloyd Lee, pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, then briefly addressed the Society on the beautiful life and character of President McKinley.

The governing committee met on December 7th and chose J. Sherlock Davis to fill the vacancy caused by the election of Mr. Parsons to the office of treasurer. Francis B. Stedman was elected chairman, and the following gentlemen selected as the house committee: Andrew J. C. Foyé, Evarts L. Prentiss and H. B. C. Plimpton.

At the meeting of December 9th President Hoyt read the following list of committees for the ensuing year: Governing: Francis B. Stedman, chairman; Evarts L. Prentiss, Raymond C. Penfield, James Sherlock Davis, James G. Newcomb, Emerson McMillin, Rush Taggart, Flamen Ball Candler, Cass Gilbert; literature and art: Charles H. Niehaus, chairman; George D. M. Peixotto, Alexander Doyle, Langdon S. Thompson, Albert Shaw; entertainment: Warren Higley, chairman; Andrew Ernest Foyé, Francis X. Butler, Francis B. Stedman, Oscar B. Thomas; library: Francis M. Applegate, chairman; Mahlon Chance, H. H. Sisson, Leonard D. Morrison, Winchester Fitch; auditing: Louis D. Clarke, chairman; Richard J. Chard, Warner Ells, Charles L. Paar, Andrew Linn; house: Andrew J. C. Foyé, chairman; Evarts L. Prentiss, Henry B. C. Plimpton.

Judge Higley presented for honorary membership the names of Hon. Joseph B. Foraker and Hon. Marcus A. Hanna, senators from Ohio, to be acted upon at the next regular meeting. Mr. Crall offered three added sections as an amendment to Article III of the by-laws, which were eventually adopted as follows:

“SEC. 3. Any seven or more members may, in like manner, prepare and report to the Society, another ticket to be voted for at the annual election, provided that such ticket be prepared and posted on the bulletin board in the rooms of the Society at least ten days prior to the date of the annual meeting.

“SEC. 4. Members who are thus named, and whose names appear on such ticket or tickets, prepared and posted as hereinbefore prescribed, and no others, shall be eligible for election.

“SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the secretary of the Society to send a copy of such tickets by mail to each Active member at least seven days prior to the election. The ticket reported by the nominating committee shall be headed ‘Ticket reported by the Nominating Committee,’ and the other ticket, if any, shall be headed ‘Independent Ticket.’”

Major Abbott raised the question of the small attendance of the annual meeting as compared with the number of members, and also the small membership of the Society as compared with the number of Ohioans in New York and vicinity. Mr. Parsons moved “that a committee be appointed to get up a circular letter soliciting members, and that it be referred to the governing committee, and that they send out a letter to each member requesting him to send in the names of good Ohioans, and get live membership in the Society.” Seconded by Mr. Southard. General Burnett moved to amend that the governing board be instructed to get up and send out such a letter. Amendment accepted, and motion as amended carried.

President Hoyt spoke about the annual banquet and asked an expression of opinion from the Society on the subject. General Burnett moved that a banquet committee be at once appointed by the chair, and that that committee designate a day for the holding of the annual banquet, the nearest day consistent with the securing of the speakers whom we desire, "and as a suggestion for the committee that Secretary Hay be invited as our honored guest on that occasion. In the event of Secretary Hay not being able to come, that we invite as the guests of the Society all the senators of the United States who were born in Ohio, or residents of Ohio, and make it an 'Ohio Senators' Banquet.'" Mr. Southard seconded the motion, and after his experience as president, heartily concurred with General Burnett as to the wisdom of prompt action and an early banquet. The motion was carried.

Major Abbott gave an interesting account of Secretary Hay's statesmanship and prompt grasp of the situation in China as to whether our troops there should cooperate under the leadership of any of the foreign generals, his decision being a decided negative, and the effect it had on the foreign powers.

Following one of the suggestions in the above, the governing committee met on December 27th and approved the following letter, prepared by Mr. Parsons, and directed that the same should be sent to the members:

"To _____ (a member).

"Dear Sir:—There are many Ohioans now living in Greater New York and vicinity, also in Ohio and other states, who are eligible to membership in the Ohio Society of New York, and who might deem it an honor to become a member. We request you to send to Mr. Albert F. Hagar, secretary, 10 Wall Street, the names of any one whom you know would be desirable acquisitions to our Society, stating their profession or business and present address."

The treasurer read a letter from William Perry Fogg, first treasurer of the Society, to Mr. Crall, the late treasurer, expressing regret that the state of his health, and residence outside the city, prevented him from attending meetings of the Society; and saying that he therefore deemed it best to resign his membership. The treasurer also read a copy of Mr. Crall's letter, in reply thereto, recalling pleasant recollections of their work in connection with organizing the Society, and beautifully expressing the esteem in which he himself and the Society held Mr. Fogg. Both letters were received and placed on file. Mr. Fogg's resignation was accepted, with regret.

On January 13th, 1902, President Hoyt reported that General Burnett and himself went to Washington and saw Secretary Hay, who regretted very much that he was unable to accept the invitation of the Ohio Society to be its guest at the annual banquet. They had seen Senator Foraker and had gotten acceptances from all the nine senators born in Ohio, and from the attorney general of the United States. It would therefore be a "United States Senators' Banquet." Mr. Foyé, for the house committee, reported that the banquet hall of the Waldorf-Astoria had been secured for Saturday night, March 1st.

Secretary Hay, Governor Nash and Senators Foraker and Hanna, proposed at previous meetings for honorary membership, were duly elected.

Mahlon Chance made a speech on the early settlement of Ohio by the Whittaker family, in Sandusky county, prior to 1780, and before that made at Marietta, Ohio, in 1788. The facts for Mr. Chance's remarks were collected by John R. Moore, of Fremont, Ohio, assisted by Col. Webb C. Hayes. Mr. Chance's remarks were followed with great interest by those present, the final conclusion being that at any rate "Ohio had been settled." Mr. Ball moved that it be requested that copies of Mr. Chance's remarks be furnished the Society, and that they be embodied in the minutes. Carried. Judge Higley suggested that "we pass a vote of thanks in the form of a resolution to Mr. John P. Moore for what he has done toward the development of Ohio history." It was so ordered.

The evening of Monday, January 27, 1902, had been set aside by the Society in honor of "The Daughters of Ohio,"* a newly-formed social organization of Ohio women in New York. The entertainment took the form of an informal reception and art exhibit, and there was a large attendance of members of both organizations. A pleasant program was presented. Judge Higley, chairman of the entertainment committee, called especial attention to the exhibit of pictures and statuary that had been arranged for the evening, a list of which follows:

MAIN PARLOR.

- G. D. M. Peixotto, "Admiral Schley," study head.
- Irving R. Wiles, "Roses."

- Edward Potthast, "Modesty."
- G. H. Smillie, "Landscape."

* The following brief statement is from the first annual report of Louise Kennedy Mabie, first historian of the Daughters of Ohio, as presented and approved, in 1902: "There was a meeting of five ladies in the Ohio Society rooms at the Waldorf-Astoria on the afternoon of November 4, 1901. The ladies were Mrs. A. J. C. Foyé, Mrs. Abner C. Thomas, Mrs. R. J. Chard, Mrs. Warren Higley and Mrs. Emma Archer Osborne. Among other things they discussed sending notices to the press inviting Ohio women to meet together one week from that day, November 11th, at the same place. Mrs. Osborne sent out seven press notices and over twenty ladies came in answer to the call. At this meeting they were asked to sign agreements to unite in forming an association. The Society was formally organized at the next meeting, November 19, 1901."

In the gathering of February 10th President Hoyt, for the banquet committee, stated that he had discovered another United States senator originally from Ohio, making ten in all, and that they had all promised to come to the banquet. That Attorney General Knox, Assistant Attorney General Beck, Solicitor General Richards, Governor Odell and Mayor Low would also be there. He also read letters from Secretary Hay and Senators Foraker and Hanna, each expressing his appreciation of the honor conferred by electing him an honorary member. Also one from the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, expressing his regret that he would not be able to attend the annual banquet. The letters from Colonel Hay and Senators Foraker and Hanna were as follows:

“DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 22, 1902.

“My Dear Sir:—I have received your kind letter informing me that I have been elected an honorary member of the Ohio Society. I deeply appreciate the honor you have done me, and accept it with pleasure and gratitude. I am, sir, “Respectfully yours,

“Hon. Colgate Hoyt, President Ohio Society.

“My Dear Sir:—The official advice of my election as an honorary member of the Ohio Society of New York has just reached me. It is certainly an honor to be identified with such an organization of men potent in the affairs of the nation and of its metropolis. It is indeed a high compliment to be selected for an honor so carefully guarded and so seldom bestowed. It will add to the pleasure I have always found in attending your annual meetings, and I will now look forward to them with an additional and more personal interest. I would be pleased if you would convey to your members an assurance of my deep appreciation and thanks.

“UNITED STATES SENATE, WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 23, 1902.

“Hon. Colgate Hoyt, President of the Ohio Society.

“Dear Sir:—I write to acknowledge the receipt of the notice you have sent me of the action of the Ohio Society of New York in electing me an honorary member. The character and standing of the Ohio Society of New York are so high and so universally recognized that the compliment is one to be indeed appreciated. In accepting, I thank you for such a kind remembrance, and earnestly hope that your future may be as creditable and as satisfactory to all concerned as is the record already made.

“Very truly yours,

“J. B. FORAKER.”

CHAPTER XVII

THE sixteenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society was given at the Waldorf-Astoria, on the evening of Saturday, March 1, 1902. The presence of ten senators of the United States, with Buckeye blood in the veins of most of them and an Ohio residence standing to the honor of the rest; of the attorney general of the United States, of the general of the army; of the mayor of New York and the lieutenant governor of the state, and of other distinguished men, formed a drawing card of extraordinary power. Every son of Ohio, and every grandson or second cousin, who could possibly be present, put in an appearance. Over four hundred guests marched in and took their appointed places, when the doors of the banquet hall were thrown open.

As has been already suggested, the taking idea was conceived of giving this dinner in honor of the members of the senate of the United States who were either born in Ohio or had spent some portion of their lives in that state. A delegation, headed by President Colgate Hoyt, proceeded to Washington, and after much labor and many arguments, succeeded in rounding up the gentlemen who fulfilled either of the above Buckeye conditions. In addition, they also bespoke the attendance of Senator Spooner of Wisconsin, who was born so near to the Ohio line, that he might also be counted as among the elect. The senatorial guests invited were as follows:

Senators J. B. Foraker and M. A. Hanna of Ohio, Stephen B. Elkins and N. B. Scott of West Virginia, W. B. Allison of Iowa, John P. Jones and W. M. Stewart of Nevada, C. W. Fairbanks and A. J. Beveridge of Indiana, and Senator Spooner of Wisconsin.

The committee also secured the attendance of Hon. P. C. Knox, attorney general of the United States, who accepted as the personal representative of the president and of the administration. He was accompanied by his assistant, Hon. James M. Beck of Kentucky, an orator of great power.

There was such an array of distinguished gentlemen invited for the president's table, that the list is here reproduced in full from the official diagram:

Hon. Irving M. Scott, of California; Hon. Augustus Van Wyck, President Southern Society; Mr. Augustus Thomas, President Missouri Society;

Mr. Edmund C. Stedman, President New England Society; Hon. Seth Low, Mayor of New York; Hon. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio; Hon. John K. Richards, Solicitor General U. S.; Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Commanding U. S. A.; Hon. J. C. Spooner, U. S. Senator Wisconsin; Hon. C. W. Fairbanks, U. S. Senator Indiana; Hon. J. P. Jones, U. S. Senator Nevada; Hon. W. B. Allison, U. S. Senator Iowa; Hon. P. C. Knox, Attorney General U. S.; Hon. Joseph B. Foraker, U. S. Senator Ohio; Hon. Colgate Hoyt, President; Hon. Marcus A. Hanna, U. S. Senator Ohio; Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, U. S. Senator West Virginia; Hon. W. M. Stewart, U. S. Senator Nevada; Hon. A. J. Beveridge, U. S. Senator Indiana; Hon. N. B. Scott, U. S. Senator West Virginia; Hon. James M. Beck, Ass't Attorney General U. S.; Maj. Gen. James H. Wilson, U. S. A.; Hon. Timothy L. Woodruff, Lieut. Governor New York; Rev. W. H. P. Faunce, D. D., President Brown University; Hon. Robert B. Roosevelt, Holland Society; Mr. T. H. Bartindale, President Canadian Society; Mr. Robert C. Ogden, Pennsylvania Society; Mr. Robert F. Munro, St. Andrew's Society.

The committees in charge comprised the following gentlemen: Banquet committee: Henry L. Burnett, chairman; Colgate Hoyt, John J. McCook, Whitelaw Reid, Samuel H. Parsons, treas.; Leander H. Crall, John D. Archbold, Warren Higley, William S. Hawk, Louis D. Clarke, Richard J. Chard, Paul D. Cravath, Samuel Mather, Wager Swayne, Milton I. Southard, Anson G. McCook, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H. Wheeler, David Homer Bates, Evarts L. Prentiss, Thomas Ewing, Jr., George E. Armstrong, Charles A. Moore, H. S. Julier, Mahlon Chance, Albert F. Hagar, secretary. Reception committee: Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; Lowell M. Palmer, Charles Hedges, H. B. Wilson, R. C. Penfield, Rollin M. Morgan, De Frees Critten, Merrill Watson, Patrick Ryan, Andrew Lynn, Winchester Fitch, Warner Ells, L. D. Morrison, O. B. Thomas, H. B. Brundrett, H. H. Brockway, James G. Newcomb, C. C. Shayne, Francis B. Stedman, Peter H. Burnett, James H. Kennedy, Henry B. C. Plimpton, Norman C. Raff, James Sherlock Davis, David Homer Bates, Jr., John J. Crawford, H. H. Sisson.

On the Friday morning preceding the banquet President Hoyt went to Washington in his private car for the purpose of escorting the distinguished Washington contingent to New York. He was accompanied by W. S. Hawk, proprietor of the Manhattan hotel, and they were to be met at Washington by Gen. Henry L. Burnett, chairman of the dinner committee.

Mr. Hawk, who is an Ohio man, and a member of the Ohio Society, had carried patriotic generosity to the limit, by entertaining the senators at his hotel free of charge, a compliment that the committee and the Society appreciated.

The special car containing the committee and guests reached New York

Saturday afternoon, and carriages were taken to the Manhattan hotel. At a few minutes after six o'clock the distinguished gentlemen again entered the carriages, and were driven to the Waldorf-Astoria, where a reception was held in the Astor gallery. President Hoyt and the senators stood in line, and as each guest arrived, he was taken in charge by some member of the reception committee, and presented to the gentlemen who stood in line. The members of the dinner committee and of the reception committee were present in full force, doing all that lay within their power to make the occasion a success.

It was a few minutes before seven when the members of the Society and their guests marched into the banquet hall to the sound of stirring music, and each took his station at his designated round table, and remained standing.

Then President Hoyt and the reception committee came in, two by two, each escorting one of the distinguished guests of the evening. Mr. Hoyt led the way, accompanied by Senator Foraker, the senior senator from Ohio.

Grace was said by Rev. Dr. Faunce, and seats were taken and in a moment the first order of the evening was under way.

The room was a mass of flowers, of plants, of flags, and of reminders of Ohio as a commonwealth. The souvenir program was a work of art. Three handsome sheets of cartridge paper enclosed a number of leaflets. On the outside was a branch from the buckeye tree in natural green and brown, and a shield of Ohio in gold. On one of the leaves was a portrait group of the senators, whose coming had made this a senatorial night; on another the menu; on a third the names of the banquet committee, and on a fourth the program for the evening, preceded by an inscription in red and burnt-wood effect in these words:

THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL BANQUET OF THE
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK,

In honor of Ohio in the United States Senate, at the Waldorf-Astoria, Saturday evening, March First, Nineteen Hundred and Two.

Then followed the oratorical program in these words:

"Ohio in the Senate," Senator Joseph B. Foraker; "Labor and Capital," Senator Marcus A. Hanna; "The United States," Hon. James M. Beck, assistant attorney general of the United States; "Ohio in War," Senator Charles W. Fairbanks; "Our Foreign Possessions," Senator Albert J. Beveridge; "Just Over the Line," Senator John C. Spooner; "The State of New York," Governor Benjamin B. Odell, Jr.; "The City of New York," Mayor Seth Low; "Our Sister Societies," Augustus Thomas, Esq.

At 8:30 the doors to the two galleries about the banquet hall were thrown open and a large number of ladies entered, that they might hear the speeches. Admission was by card only. The ladies were escorted by a special reception committee, of which Andrew Ernest Foyé was chairman. One or two of the boxes were reserved for the ladies who came as guests of President Hoyt and of the senators.

President Hoyt rapped for order, and the second half of the feast was dispatched with celerity and enthusiasm. His opening remarks were as follows:

"Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York and Our Honored Guests of the Evening:—I propose, first of all, that every one of us, standing, fill our glasses and drink in silence a toast to the memory of our late president, William McKinley. (It was drunk in silence.) I now propose, still standing, that we drink a toast to that courageous, aggressive and efficient son of our adopted state, Theodore Roosevelt, the president of the United States. }

"We are especially honored to-night in having with us a member of the president's cabinet, the Hon. P. C. Knox, and while we are under pledge not to ask him to speak, we would all of us be most gratified if he would allow us to welcome him here now. (Mr. Knox bowed his thanks.)

"The Ohio Society of New York is celebrating to-night its sixteenth annual banquet. It has arrived at a most interesting age, that of 'sweet sixteen'; and, as I look up at the ladies (for we men always have to look up when looking at the ladies), I am sure that I am not treading on dangerous ground when I say that even they are willing to acknowledge that they are sixteen years old. And I am sure, also, the gentlemen gathered around these tables will all endorse the statement when I say that none of the ladies here to-night look over sixteen.

"The Ohio Society of New York has been fortunate in enjoying many notable banquets, but we have never been more highly honored, nor have we ever had reason to be more proud than we are to-night in the presence of so many distinguished guests. 'Ohio in the Senate' surely has reason to be proud of her sons there; for there are ten senators now serving in the senate who were either born in Ohio or were citizens of that favored state, and seven of the ten can claim Ohio as their birthplace. No other state in the union can claim more than half that number of senators, and only two other states can claim five.

"Ohio has all the senators from three states aside from her own, namely, Indiana, in Senators Fairbanks and Beveridge; West Virginia, in Senators Elkins and Scott; and Nevada, in Senators Jones and Stewart, and in two other states she has representatives, in Iowa Senator Allison, and in Michigan Senator Burrows. Ohio is a tie with Virginia in furnishing presidents for the United States, and, but for the fact that we from Ohio are so modest, we would not hesitate to predict that if you give her a little time, she will in the near future pass even the old state of Virginia in that honor. As I said before, we are especially pleased in having the present cabinet of the United States represented in its attorney general, and also in its assistant attorney general, the Hon. James M. Beck.

"We are also pleased to welcome the solicitor general from Washington, the Hon. John K. Richards, who is an Ohio boy. We welcome round our tables the presidents and representatives of the different sister societies of the state of New York. We have New England, Pennsylvania, Holland, Canada, Southern Society and Missouri represented here to-night. But it is not my province to take up your time with any extended remarks, but rather to give way at once in order that you may enjoy hearing from our distinguished guests."

Attorney General Knox, though not down on the program as a speaker, responded to the first toast. He complimented President Roosevelt upon his faithful adherence to the policy of President McKinley as laid down in the Buffalo speech. Referring to the president's attitude toward Cuba, he said:

"Even to-day President Roosevelt is giving his best effort and energy to prove that we have not left this poor alien southern nation to poverty and distress."

In introducing Senator Foraker, Mr. Hoyt said:

"Ohio has been honored through many of her great sons, but by none more than by the gentleman on my right; he was a gallant soldier in the civil war, an able jurist, a distinguished and courageous governor, and, after serving his state so efficiently as governor, Ohio called him higher, and to-day he stands a leader among men in the senate of the United States."

Senator Foraker said, in part:

"When I was informed that I was expected to speak before your Society here in New York I found myself so busy that I could not find a moment to prepare a fitting response to your courtesy. I postponed the preparation of a speech until a day or two before my setting out for New York. The postponement proved fatal. I found myself so much occupied with South Carolina that I was precluded from turning my thoughts to my native state."

This allusion to the Tillman-McLaurin imbroglio caused a hearty laugh. After enumerating Ohio's long list of distinguished senators, Mr. Foraker was applauded when he said, "And I know I can say without hurting anybody's feelings that John Sherman was the greatest of them all."

With playful allusions to the posts of influence held by men of Ohio birth in the senate committees, Senator Foraker said: "You can't get an appropriation through without Allison's consent. Without the influence of Fairbanks, you cannot get a postoffice, and without Beveridge's coöperation you can't get anything you want in the territories. As for Senator Jones, he presides over the contingent fund, and without his approval you cannot even have a messenger boy appointed.

"Now, as for my colleague, Senator Hanna"—(here the speaker was interrupted with loud cheers and cries of "What's the matter with Hanna? He's all right!") Continuing, Mr. Foraker said:

"Well, in the senate, as everywhere else, Hanna is 'it.' He is on about every committee there is, and there is not much going on unless he has a finger in it." Referring to the great fight between the Jefferson Democrats and the Hamilton Federalists over Ohio coming into the Union in 1801, the Senator said:

"The fights you read about between Hanna and me aren't a patch to what that fight was. Rival party men in those days called one another anarchists and murderers. Why, they talked worse than Senator Hoar does to-day about our rule over the Philippines.

"Having made this kind of a start in 1801, all that has followed has followed naturally. Our Ohio political fathers set the pace. We have been merely keeping it up. From that day to this no man could hope to hold up his end in the Ohio political hustings without meeting foemen worthy of his steel.

"Ohio politics has never been one sided until within the last few years, and since that time, so as not to get out of practice, we've been keeping up a little fighting among ourselves. But you always find us presenting a united front to the common political enemy."

President Hoyt introduced Senator Hanna in these words:

"Ohio is truly proud of her long line of great statesmen, but she is equally proud of her sons who in finance, transportation, in commerce, in mining and in great industries of this country have taken such a prominent part. Chief among these stands a gentleman (who, by the way, is a member of this Society, and whom many of you know), who grew up on the shores of Lake Erie, and who is now counted as one of the wealthiest, if not the wealthiest man in the world, Mr. Rockefeller, for he it is to whom I refer, in addressing a class of young men a few months since, said that he had derived pleasure and satisfaction in being able to give to institutions of learning, to churches and religious organizations, but that the greatest satisfaction that had come to him in his many years of hard work, had been the fact that the company which he organized, and was still the president of, from its organization up to the present time, had paid out for labor alone over six hundred millions of dollars, and never had a serious strike. The man who can give his millions may benefit mankind, but, in my judgment, the man who can furnish to the great mass of wage-earners constant work, and thus crown their honest toil with steady return for their labor, equally benefits his fellow men.

“Speaking of labor, we are honored to-night in having with us another son of Ohio, who, while he has not been unfamiliar with capital, has been equally familiar with labor, and who is a great believer in the doctrine that instead of labor being antagonistic to capital, it should go hand in hand, each complementing and helping the other. I take great pleasure, therefore, in being able to introduce to you now the other senator from Ohio, the Hon. Marcus A. Hanna, who will respond to the toast, ‘Labor and Capital.’”

“This is an occasion to make a man proud of his nativity,” said Senator Hanna, when the applause which greeted him had subsided. “Surely Ohio is an incubator of statesmen and equally surely is it a soil productive of great men in all walks and vocations of life. The men who do things are the proudest product of any state, and the men who make themselves felt in other states, as Ohio men have, reflect the greatest credit on their nativity.” Continuing, Senator Hanna said:

“Apropos of doing things, some one in this country has been doing things; some one in this country has been doing things for the past fifty years and doing them well. When one looks back over what has been done in that time he is almost rendered speechless. Our evolution in that brief time has brought us to where we stand now in the commercial and industrial world, second to no nation on the face of the earth.

“The great natural resources of our country, coupled with the terrific energy of our cosmopolitan people, have made us what we are, a people whose capitalists of to-day were the laborers of yesterday. The men who are at the heads of our great iron and steel industries in this country are the men who worked first at the puddle, the furnace and the roll. There stands the aristocracy of labor, not the aristocracy of blood, but the aristocracy of brains and brawn. (Applause.)

“We have gone ahead in this country until now for the first time in our history capital stands alone on its own foundations. We are to-day a creditor nation and fast becoming the money centre of the world. It surely is not strange that this question of capital and labor is being forced to the public attention. It is not strange that the men who do things should begin to consider that problem from a social standpoint.

“If the development of wealth is to make us strong in this country we should see to it that all who contribute to the development of this wealth have fair and equal consideration. (Loud applause.) The men who work with their hands are as much a part of this wealth as the men who work with their brains and they are entitled to a share of all the good that comes from it.

“And now I want to say a word to you about the Civic Federation. It is a new-born organization, but it is not a new-born subject. It is a culmination of that concrete thought which has led thoughtful and reasonable men to consider something outside of their own selfish interests. No man loyal to his country will shut his eyes to the importance of this thing.

“The man of little education and small opportunities appeals to you to lift him up and not by word or act to keep him down. Therein lies the social elevation of the country. The federation has started in with the idea that there shall be no class, no one man better than another.

“It is the object of the federation to appeal to the American people who employ labor, the great captains of industry, to join in this movement, and when they do this it is the beginning of things never thought of or dreamed of before. To those few who are laboring in this vineyard now there comes nothing but praise and commendation from every part of the country.

“I want to take this opportunity, too, to thank the great press of the country for its assistance in bringing capital and labor together and making them sit face to face and heart to heart. When men sit down together in this way to consider things in a spirit of fairness there can be no such word as fail. Our membership should only be limited by the population of the United States, and the purpose for which the federation is laboring should receive the support of the people of the whole country.

“And I want to tell you that when capital and labor can thus meet face to face and heart to heart, we have only begun to lay the foundation of our future greatness.”

President Hoyt spoke of the Ohio boy who sat in a senator's seat from Indiana in these words:

“Ohio has been great in her statesmen; Ohio has been great in her business energy and men of affairs; but Ohio has been no less great in her heroes and fighters for our beloved country. No state can boast of so many generals who have risen to the high position of commanding general of the army of the United States as Ohio; for three of her sons, Grant, Sherman and Sheridan, have held that high office, and the present general commanding the army of the United States, and who has honored us with his presence to-night, did the next best thing to being born in Ohio by securing his better half from that favored state. Our next toast, ‘Ohio in the War,’ will be responded to by a distinguished senator from the state of Indiana, although a son of Ohio, the Hon. C. W. Fairbanks, whom I now introduce to you.”

HON. MARCUS A. HANNA

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The senior senator from Indiana was exceedingly happy in his references to Ohio's contribution to the history of the nation. He said in part:

"Ohio wrote a record of surpassing brilliancy in the gravest and most tragic period of our national history.

"Forty years have come and gone since the historic shot at Fort Sumter which aroused the country from its lethargy and stirred it to its heroic duty. It was then Ohio sent word to Washington to the effect that if Kentucky could not fill her quota Ohio stood ready to make up the difference.

"First and last," said Mr. Fairbanks, "Ohio sent 340,000 soldiers into the field, the very pick and flower of the youth of the state. When treason capitulated those who had not paid the last full measure of patriotic devotion to their country returned whence they came and resumed their civic duties.

"The fame of her immortal triumvirate encircles the globe. All honor to Ulysses S. Grant, William T. Sherman and Phil Sheridan. And there were Rosecrans and McPherson, Gillmore and McDowell, Buell and Cox, Stedman and McCook, Hayes and Force."

Senator Fairbanks dwelt at some length on the services rendered during the war by the "sons of Ohio" in both branches of Congress as well as in prominent positions in the administrative departments of the government.

"Of those who served in the army of the Union," he continued, "five whose places of nativity were in the Buckeye state subsequently held the highest commission which the American people could bestow. Their names spring unbidden to our lips: Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Harrison and McKinley."

Of Senator Beveridge, President Hoyt said: "We are again honored with the presence of another senator from Indiana—but an Ohio boy—and who, having grown up breathing the invigorating air of that dear state, has developed into one of its most distinguished orators."

Senator Beveridge spoke on "Our Foreign Possessions." He objected to the word "foreign" as applied to American possessions, saying that modern science had brought distant lands to the doors of this country. He declared that Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines were trust estates, and warned Americans not to prove faithless to their trust.

"Our task of bringing order and prosperity in these islands," he said, "will be performed with characteristic American adaptability. The work was given us by God; we have the experience of nations and our own genius to fall back on in this hour. American suzerainty in Cuba will never cease except by annexation. Our policy in the Philippines will depend on how readily the natives show their loyalty to our flag." Senator Beveridge counselled patience. He closed by saying that to-day no move was made on the map of the world without other nations first consulting the United States.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Assistant United States Attorney General James M. Beck spoke on "The United States." He endorsed Senator Hanna's utterances. He said that the increasing wealth of the United States was not a question of one-half the moment of that of labor and capital. This country, he declared, would always be a wealthy nation—that he had been told one member of the Ohio Society was sufficiently wealthy to have paid the debt that Bismarck placed on France or to have purchased the palace at Versailles. The great question that confronts the nation, he asserted, did not relate to wealth, but had to do with the relations of capital and labor.

"Unless," said he, "labor and capital are united, we may fear no foe without, but surely our country will be rent with internecine strife.

"Men like Senator Hanna are extending the hand of friendship to labor. Along this path lie the peace and prosperity of the Republic. God speed him to bridge the gulf between wealth and poverty, and promote that peace and equality of opportunity for which the Republic was created."

Continuing, Mr. Beck proceeded to tell jokes about Ohio. He spent some time in explaining why Benjamin Franklin had not been born in that state. "It was his principle," said the speaker, "never to seek office, never to refuse one, and never to resign one." The first of these three principles, said Mr. Beck, excluded the theory that Franklin might have been a Buckeye citizen.

Toward Mr. Hanna Mr. Beck directed some of his wit. He said that the Senator had become such a great man in his native state that Ohioans no longer reckoned time in the usual way, but that they had come to speak of this year, for instance, as "Hanna Domini, 1902."

Augustus Thomas, the famous playwright, made a most admirable and witty speech in response to the toast "Our Sister Societies." Mayor Low, Governor Odell, Lieutenant Governor Woodruff and Senator Spooner of Wisconsin, all of whom were expected to speak, were not present.

When the speeches were finished, Mr. Hoyt dismissed the audience with these words: "The time has now come for us to draw the sixteenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York to a close; and I am sure that we have all had a good time, and I am equally sure that every member of the Society desires to extend to all our honored guests their thanks for being present with us; and their thanks also to those who have so entertained us by speaking to-night. We only regret that the time was so short that it has been impossible to hear from all of our guests, and with thanks to all who have aided us in making this a most agreeable evening, we will now adjourn."

In the meeting of March 10th, Mr. Parsons spoke of the great success of the annual banquet, which was due, he said, more than anything else, to the energy and hard work of President Hoyt. A vote of thanks was tendered to President Hoyt, Treasurer Parsons and A. J. C. Foyé, chairman of the house committee, for their services in connection with the banquet, and also to William S. Hawk, proprietor of the Manhattan hotel, for his generous hospitality in entertaining at his hotel the guests of honor from Washington who attended the banquet. A vote of thanks was also extended to Ernest A. Foyé, chairman of the reception committee, for the manner in which he had performed the duties assigned to him.

Judge Higley moved that the Society give a dinner at the Manhattan Hotel on the second Monday in April; that this be complimentary to the members, and that the members be permitted to invite guests. Carried. On motion, the details of this dinner were left to the chairman of the house committee, Mr. Foyé. There being no further business, the meeting adjourned to enjoy the entertainment prepared for them by Judge Higley and his committee, as follows:

The governing committee, in its meeting of April, ordered that hereafter the speeches delivered at the annual banquets be taken down by a stenographer, and in the discretion of the governing committee, published in the annual year book and sent to each member, together with the programme of the banquet. It was also ordered that the matter of ordering further year books be left to the treasurer, with power. It was moved by Mr. Penfield and carried that the governing committee recommend to the Society that the president be given power to appoint an historian of the Society.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The evening of April 14th was designated as "ladies' night." The members and their ladies met at the Manhattan hotel, where an excellent dinner was served. When the time for business arrived, Mr. Stedman, on behalf of the governing committee, announced the election of twenty resident and fifteen non-resident members.

Then followed an episode that gave pleasure to all who were present. Ex-President Southard, in a few well chosen words, presented to Leander H. Crall, the recent treasurer of the Society, a handsome loving cup, from various members of the Society, as a token of regard for him and a slight appreciation of his valuable labors on behalf of the Society during the thirteen years in which he had been its treasurer. Howard E. Crall accepted the cup on behalf of his father, who was ill in the South, and in a most felicitous speech thanked the donors for having remembered his father by the presentation of this beautiful gift.

S. E. Johnson, editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer, formerly of Columbus, Ohio, now of Washington, D. C., gave an interesting account of journalistic experience. Capt. James Parker, a native Buckeye—a veteran naval officer both of the Mexican and civil wars, and counsel for Admiral Schley in the late investigation, related most entertainingly many incidents of his long and eventful life. James H. Kennedy thanked the Society for having chosen him as its historian. Stewart Chisholm, of Cleveland, then addressed the Society in a happy vein, this closing the intellectual part of the program.

The Misses Hoyt, Buckeye girls, added much to the pleasure of the evening by their sweet singing and whistling.

Mr. Applegate, in the May meeting, reported on behalf of the library committee. It was the sense of that committee that the library should be essentially an "Ohio Library," and they recommended that the histories of the various counties, not already secured, be added; also the lives of prominent Ohio men; and that a letter be sent to the members asking for the donation of such books, and that if they are not then forthcoming, they could be purchased with the appropriation placed at the disposal of the committee by the governing board. Adopted, and such a letter was directed to be sent.

Col. Wilson Vance then favored the Society with a reading on the battle of Stone's River, from his book, "God's War." He held the close attention of his hearers by his vivid and thrilling word picture of this memorable battle.

At the meeting in October, 1902, the following gentlemen were selected as the nominating committee, to recommend officers to be elected at the annual meeting in November: M. I. Southard, H. H. Brockway, E. L. Prentiss, A. W. Gilmore, P. Ryan, George Follett and F. X. Butler.

President Hoyt welcomed the members back from their summer vacation, and hoped for a better year's work for the Society than ever before.

He also spoke of the recent death of a fellow member, ex-Gov. George Hoadly. Judge Higley spoke feelingly on the subject, and moved that a committee be appointed to draft suitable resolutions. Carried. The chair named as such committee the following gentlemen: Judge Higley, General Burnett, Mr. Southard, Mr. Ewing and Mr. Foyé.

President Hoyt spoke of the coming annual banquet, and said that he would like to appoint the banquet committee at the next meeting, and also be authorized to appoint Mr. Foyé to see the hotel people and ascertain what night in January they could secure the banquet hall. The power was conferred upon him.

Mr. Hagar moved that a committee of five be appointed by the chair to arrange for a dinner on the 29th of November, and that the program on that occasion be arranged to bring out the points of the day we are celebrating, i.e., the centennial of the admission of Ohio into the Union. Carried, and the chair appointed as such committee Messrs. A. F. Hagar, A. J. C. Foyé, James H. Kennedy, Thomas Ewing and Judge Warren Higley, to act in conjunction with the house committee.

President Hoyt spoke of his recent trip to Cleveland to attend the "silver wedding" of the First Cleveland Troop, of which he had been a charter member. He said he found several Ohio Society men there and several more who ought to be Ohio Society men. Major Abbott added something which Mr. Hoyt had omitted, to-wit, that "Mr. Hoyt, of New York," had made a very happy and brilliant speech on that occasion. President Hoyt gave an interesting history of the First Cleveland Troop, the distinguished men who had been connected with it, and the historic occasions on which it had held the post of honor.

Judge Higley, as chairman of the committee on resolutions on the death of ex-Governor Hoadly, offered a report at the November meeting, paying a high tribute to the memory of this distinguished son of Ohio, who was also a member of the Ohio Society. It was adopted.

Mr. Southard, chairman of the committee on nominations for the ensuing year, read the following names: President, Colgate Hoyt; Vice-Presidents, Thomas Ewing, Jr., David Homer Bates, John J. McCook, Louis D. Clarke, Lowell M. Palmer; Secretary, Francis M. Applegate; Recording secretary, Charles W. Morris; Treasurer, Samuel H. Parsons; Trustees, Andrew Ernest Foyé, Leonard D. Morrison, Warner Ells.

President Hoyt appointed the following gentlemen as members of the banquet committee: John J. McCook, Whitelaw Reid, Samuel H. Parsons, treas.; Leander H. Crall, John D. Archbold, Warren Higley, William S. Hawk, Louis D. Clarke, Paul D. Cravath, Samuel Mather, Wager Swayne, Milton I. Southard, Anson G. McCook, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas H.

Wheeler, David Homer Bates, Thomas Ewing, Jr., George E. Armstrong, H. S. Julier, Mahlon Chance, Albert F. Hagar, Henry L. Burnett, E. B. Thomas, L. C. Weir, E. A. Stedman, Francis M. Applegate, Lowell M. Palmer, Julius E. French, Henry D. Lyman, Francis B. Stedman, George W. Perkins, James H. Kennedy, Evarts L. Prentiss.

President Hoyt stated that it was to be a Diplomatic Banquet, and that Secretary Hay and the foreign ambassadors would be present. Judge Higley, as chairman of the committee on dinner on November 29th, reported that it would be at the Manhattan hotel. After the election of officers, the event of the evening would be an address by ex-Governor Campbell, on the "Constitutional Convention of Ohio of 1802 and Its Personnel."

The annual meeting for 1902 was held at the Manhattan hotel on the evening of November 29th. A dinner was served. When the hour for business arrived, the report of the governing committee was presented. Among the things said was the following:

"One of the most important questions that have been presented to your committee is the securing of new quarters for the Society. A sub-committee has had this question under advisement, and has given much time and consideration to the matter. A definite report from this sub-committee has not as yet been formally presented, and your governing committee is, therefore, only enabled to report progress; but it is safe to say that a suitable arrangement will be made at a very early date, whereby the present home of the Society will be retained, at least for the present.

"In the very comprehensive report of your board at the last annual meeting, the interest of the members was urgently solicited for the acquisition of new members; and this suggestion has been fruitful. Your committee, therefore, again urges the members to interest themselves in increasing the membership of the Society, both resident and non-resident. It is a well established fact that there is in our community a very large number of Ohioans eligible to membership in this Society, many of whom would be glad of an invitation to enroll themselves with us."

The report of the treasurer showed that the financial affairs of the Society had been carefully conducted during the past year, as evidenced by the large increase in the cash balance. The report showed that there was a balance of $7,111.19. The surplus showed a gain for the year of $3,436.60. Mr. Parsons further said:

"Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: We have now a membership of 450, of which 292 are resident and 152 non-resident, and 6 honorary members, against a membership in 1901 of 358. This is no fictitious roll. It was deemed advisable, in justice to the members who pay their dues, to drop those who were in arrears for two years or more, and we start this year with only about $740 dues for the year 1892 outstanding. Our gain in numbers the past year has been extraordinary, a net gain of 86 to the Society. But great efforts were made by the committee appointed to secure new members, for which they are entitled to the thanks of the Society. The result has been highly satisfactory both in numbers and the character of the gentlemen whom they have secured. We should not rest on our labors here, but keep always in mind the increase of membership, so that at no distant day our roll may be at least one thousand.

“The thanks of the Society are due to our very able auditors, Messrs. Clarke, Ells, Gilmore and Fitch, whose examination of your treasurer’s accounts was most thorough and conscientious. In conclusion, permit me to thank you for the honor you have conferred upon me in electing me to the office of treasurer, in the exercise of the duties of which office I have endeavored to serve you to the best of my ability.

“Very respectfully,

“SAMUEL H. PARSONS, Treasurer.”

The next order of business was the election of officers. A ballot was taken, and the tellers reported that the gentlemen proposed at the last succeeding meeting had been elected.

Then followed the toasts and responses of the evening, President Hoyt acting as toastmaster. The programme that had been arranged was as follows:

“One Hundred Years Ago,” James H. Kennedy.

“The New Municipal Code of Ohio,” Hon. George K. Nash.

“Ohio in Virginia,” Thomas Ewing, Jr.

“Ohio’s Constitutional Convention of 1802,” Hon. James E. Campbell.

President Hoyt in opening said: “Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York and our Honored Guests:—One year ago to-night you saw fit to unanimously elect me to the high office of president of your Society. It is not necessary for me to say that at that time it was with great fear and trembling that I accepted the responsibility you thrust upon me, and to-night as I stand before you reëlected president of this Ohio Society of New York, I hope you will not consider it egotism when I say that I stand with greater confidence than I did one year ago. (Applause.) Then I hoped that you would support me in my efforts to push the Society forward, to make it a year of greater prosperity than any year it had known in the past. To-night I know from the past that you will support me for the year to come. No president of any society has had a more loyal and honest and efficient faithful governing board than the Ohio Society of New York has had for the past year. No president has had from its standing committees more faithful and honest and efficient service than the president of this Society has had during the past year. No president of any society has had more loyal support from its members than I have had from you, and that is what gives me courage to press on for the future. One hundred and thirty-five members have been elected during the past year (applause), more than three times the number that were ever elected in a single year before, and we show nearly 100 net gain for the year after culling the list as no one but our treasurer knows how to cull it, and dropping those who were not worthy to remain.

“Gentlemen, the Ohio Society of New York celebrates the close of its sixteenth year of history and it has a record of which it may well be proud. It was the first of the state societies to be organized in this city of New York and it has been followed by many others, but it stands to-day and always will stand, I believe, at the head of them all. We have on our rolls many men of national reputation, men in the front rank in literature, finance and invention, and on our honorary list of members we have had men who have been presidents of the United States. We have had five Justices of the Supreme Court, and the number of senators it is impossible for me to count. Only last year you will remember that we found eleven senators serving in the senate of the United States, all of whom came from Ohio.

“The Ohio Society of New York stands not alone for the social advancement of its members in personal intercourse one with the other, but it stands, I am happy to say, as well for state’s pride, for if ever there was a society which had reason to be proud of its birthright and its state, that is Ohio. (Great applause.)

“But we are here not only to celebrate the successful conclusion of sixteen years of our history, but we are here to celebrate on this, the 29th day of November, 1902, the one-hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the constitution of the state of Ohio. (Applause.)

“But I am not here to make a speech to you to-night. I could not if I tried, and if I should, I fear you would feel like the man that came to Marshall P. Wilder when he was about to give an exhibition and a lecture in a western town, and in the afternoon of that day there came a tramp with a little yellow dog, and he said: ‘Mr. Wilder, I am very anxious to see your show to-night, but I haven’t got any money, and I have got nothing but this yellow dog; but I will give you this little dog if you will let me into the show,’ and Mr. Wilder said, in his usual generosity, ‘Why, take your dog; that is all right. Take your dog and go into the show,’ and he let him in, and after the show was over in the evening, as he was coming out, Mr. Wilder met him and he said, 'Well, my friend, how did you enjoy the show?' 'Well,' he said, 'to be honest with you, I am glad I kept the dog.' (Laughter.) If I should speak to you longer I am afraid you would want to keep the dog and everything else that you have.

"But, gentlemen, we have some distinguished guests with us to-night. We have our historian of the Ohio Society, and although there is no constitutional amendment yet providing for a historian, if I am your president a year longer we will have an amendment providing not only for a historian, but for a chaplain of this Society. We have among us several clergmen who are eminently fitted for that position, among them the Bishop of Ohio, Bishop Leonard, who is a member with us and whom we ought to have as chaplain of this Society, and in the near future an amendment will be proposed to the constitution providing for not only the historian, which you gave me authority a year ago to do, but also for a chaplain.

"To-night I have great pleasure in introducing to you our historian, Mr. James H. Kennedy, who will speak to us for a few moments on 'One Hundred Years Ago.'"

Mr. James H. Kennedy said: "Mr. President, our Honored Guests of the evening, Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York:—The earnest manner in which our president pronounced those words, those suggestive words, 'One hundred years ago,' reminds me of an old farmer I knew in Trumbull County, Ohio, a county which I believe this Society has semi-officially endorsed as being the greatest county in Ohio. (Laughter.) He used to give utterance to this expression whenever he heard the words, 'one hundred years,' mentioned. He said: 'If you are waiting for a meal or sparkin' a gal, one hundred years are a mighty long time, but if you have to meet a note that is coming due, it goes by before you know it.'

"One hundred years ago, when a century that had set much in motion was but lately closed, a new-born nation was standing face to face with destiny.

"Behind it was an ocean, that separated it not only from the old world, but also, in a deeper sense, from the ideals and formulas of a civilization that spoke for the past, rather than of the future.

"Before it was a wilderness so vast and far extended that the human mind could hardly contemplate its subjugation.

"Before it was a future full of hope, but with little premonition of the marvelous things that one hundred years were to accomplish.

"The people of those crude and unformed colonies which had raised the banner of independence on these shores, had by their faith and courage set much on foot already. How much, they did not dream. How were they to guess that the century before them was to accomplish more within its busy years than any one of its predecessors since the world began the writing of history?

“How were they to know of the magnificent empire that would to-day span the continent from Boston harbor to the Golden Gate of the Pacific? That palaces on wheels would carry their children across that continent between sabbath and sabbath? That in even less space, great ocean liners would bind New York and London together?

“This has, indeed, been a century of many and mighty forces. A century of Anglo-Saxon brains and energy!

“The Arab of the desert rides, and lives, and dreams, as did his fathers a thousand years ago. The patient ox treads in the mills of China, as he did when Columbus was in his cradle. There are shepherds watching their flocks on Judean hills, as there were in those days when the wise men came on their pilgrimage to Bethlehem. The nomad on the high hills of Thibet follows his herd, and turns his prayer wheel, as did his ancestors when London was a Roman possession.

“The people of the ancient nations sit dim-eyed in the dust and ashes of the past; the young giants of these later days push forward in lusty might, and into their hands have fallen the dominating influences of the present, and the forecasting of the fortunes of the future.

“One hundred years ago there was little known of any portion of this country beyond the Alleghanies.

“In fact, many of the people of the Atlantic slope cared to know little about it. They believed that the good of the new nation did not demand ‘expansion’ to that extent. There were many men—even wise men—who were fixed in the belief that other nations than their own should possess and develop that wilderness. They looked upon the Ohio country as the outer confines. They never dreamed of setting their bounds as far west as the Mississippi; while the control of the trackless wilderness beyond was the dream of ambition betrayed to madness.

“When the nineteenth century dawned Spain owned the Florida country, nor had she yet sold to France that empire known as Louisiana, that at a later day was to come into our possession through the farseeing and daring statesmanship of Thomas Jefferson, he who confessed that in making this purchase from Napoleon he had stretched the presidential power ‘until it had almost cracked!’

“When that century dawned John Adams was president and Jefferson vice-president. Washington had been laid away in the sacred shades of Mt. Vernon only a few days before. Napoleon was yet first consul of France—the imperial throne, the tragedy of Waterloo and the lonely rock of the sea, yet wrapped in the clouds of the future. There was war between England and France, even as there had been trouble between France and the United States only a short time before. The alien and sedition laws were still in force. Men were yet exultingly quoting Pinckney's defiance to Europe: 'Millions for defence; not one cent for tribute!' The new song of 'Hail Columbia,' was being sung for the first time on the streets.

"Congress had not yet, by some months, held its first session in the new national capital on the Potomac. The receipts of our government for the whole year amounted to only $13,000,000. The pirates of Algiers and Tripoli were still levying tribute on our infant merchant marine—an outrage soon ended by the guns of an American fleet. The state of New York had but recently passed a law for the gradual abolition of human slavery within her borders. American citizens were still put in prison for debt. The pillory was in use in the streets of Boston; the whipping post was a frequent instrument of punishment, and the ears of criminals were judicially cropped.

"There were few improved highways, no artificial canals, no railroads. Thirty years were to pass before Horatio Allen drove the famous 'Stourbridge Lion' on the first locomotive run of America. The newspapers were printed by hand. America had no art, no literature, no common schools. The locomotive, the steamboat, the electric telegraph and telephone, the mower and reaper, the sewing machine, photography, and a thousand and one things of the arts and sciences, were yet undreamed of. The coal, the iron, the oil, that have done so much to make America rich, were still hidden in the remote places of the earth.

"Where Ohio to-day stands, in the pride of one hundred years of statehood, nature held undisputed sway. Little settlements had been planted at the mouth of the Muskingum and of the Cuyahoga. A few venturesome traders could be found here and there. The log cabin and the wigwam stood within hail of each other, and it was well for the white man if he were permitted to pursue his way in peace. An unbroken wilderness stretched from the waters of Ohio to those of Erie. Indian paths intersected it here and there—and too often the infant settlements awoke to find that the path had become the bloody war trail.

"In all essential things Ohio was yet on the outermost edge of her history.

"We all understand the meaning of her deeds, the sentiments that actuated her, the ideals she had in view, as well as the deeds themselves. No commonwealth whose fate is embedded in history has sought more earnestly for the light and the right, than has Ohio during these hundred years.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“She has endeavored to concede to each man the natural rights of man—she groped her way dimly for a time in the case of the black man, but was true to herself in the end.

“She has given to each the right to worship God according to his own formulas, and to recite the creed demanded by his conscience.

“She has fostered education. Her district schoolhouse has been set as a beacon on every hill. She has withheld no treasure, has wearied in no labor, that would give to the son of the poorest laborer enough of education to make him understand his citizenship and rightfully translate his belief into force, through the medium of the ballot box.

“She has declared again and again for honesty in the conduct of public affairs; has upheld the purity of the franchise; has set this man up because he was worthy, and cast that one down because he had been disloyal to his trust. She has encouraged those to whom God had given special gifts, and her sons have been loyal to her, and loved her.

“She has become great in national affairs.

“She has dignified the calling of the husbandman. She has called wealth from the forest, the tilled field, the pasture; from the mine, the furnace, the forge. The smoke of her workshops pours from ten thousand chimneys. She takes her coal, and with it works into marketable shape the ores that her fleets have brought from the northwest regions, and her finished products are found in every market on the globe.

“She has produced many notable things, but her greatest production has come, not from her furnaces or been grown in her fields.

“It has come from the loins of her founders—from that sacred spot, the American home—from the little red school house—the college—the sabbath school—the town meeting—from personal touch with the people—from a mart where brains, and courage, and high ideals are the things that men prize!

“Her best production is the Ohio Man. And, Mr. President, the greatest collection of Ohio men to be found upon the face of this earth is the Ohio Society of New York; and when we find an Ohio man exceptionably able, exceptionably fitted for the position, we make him president of the Ohio Society. (Applause.) When we find a man greater yet, better yet, nobler yet in all the essentials of manhood, be he Democrat or Republican, we make him governor of the Buckeye state.”

President Hoyt said: “Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York, we are greatly favored to-night in having as our guest of honor the chief executive of the commonwealth of our fair state of Ohio, the Hon. George K. Nash, its governor. (Great applause.) Let us all rise and drink a toast to Governor Nash, of the state of Ohio. (All rise and drink a toast to Governor Nash.) Now, gentlemen, I have the pleasure of proposing a toast to you, 'The New Municipal Code of Ohio,' a code of which Governor Nash is the father, the originator, and has pushed through to a successful issue, and at our urgent request Governor Nash, of the state of Ohio, will now respond to that toast."

Governor Nash said: "Mr. President and Gentlemen:—Your president added to my pleasure when he asked me to be present at this celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the first constitution of the state of Ohio. I cannot say, however, that the pleasure was greatly increased by the request that I should talk to you about the new municipal code recently adopted in our state. This law was a work of necessity, hastily prepared and arising out of an unlooked for emergency. The first constitution of the state, in regard to the powers granted to the general assembly, regulating the organization and government of municipal corporations, differed very materially from the second constitution, that of 1851. In the first, the legislature had unlimited power in this direction, and organized cities and villages by special charters, granting to each such powers as it might wish, or as it might seem best to give. Acting under this power, prior to 1851, it followed that scarcely two cities in Ohio had the same form or kind of municipal government. Whenever any city became dissatisfied with its charter or wished a change therein, it went directly to the general assembly and asked its representative or representatives to introduce a bill for that purpose. Such bill, interesting no one except the locality involved, became a law at the request of its representative or representatives without careful consideration as to its wisdom or usefulness by the entire membership of the general assembly. Under this system such evils had grown up, that the subject became one of intense and long-continued consideration by the convention which framed the constitution of 1851. As a result of such thought the new constitution commanded the general assembly to provide by general laws for the organization of cities and incorporated villages. It further commanded that it should not pass any special act conferring corporate powers. Under these limitations it was intended that Ohio should have a uniform law for the organization of cities and a uniform law for the organization of villages.

"Before many years, however, the general assembly became restless under these limitations. Many contended that it was the height of folly to attempt to govern a city of 200,000 inhabitants by a charter with no greater powers than one which was intended for the government of a city having 5,000 people, that the wants and necessities of one were very different from those of the other, and could not be met by a general law. This resulted in a gradual breaking down by the general assembly of these restrictions. The violation of the commands of the constitution began by the classification of cities—organizing some cities in one way and other cities in another. The evil grew rapidly. Matters went from bad to worse, until the time came when scarcely two cities were organized in the same manner or under the same law. The police system of one large city differed entirely from the police system of another city equally large. In one city the executive officers consisted of men appointed by the mayor, and in another they were men, or a board composed of men elected by the people. In one city money could be lawfully borrowed for certain purposes, while to do so in another city would be illegal. In the state we had as many kinds of municipal government as had ever been conceived by the mind of man and advocated by theorists. In fact, we had greater evils than those which existed under the old constitution and all the absurdities, against which the new constitution was intended to be a perfect guard.

“These continued violations of the law of the constitution could not go on forever. A time must come when a crisis would be reached. It came in June of this year. Then the Supreme Court practically declared all the laws relating to municipalities to be unconstitutional and void. It again repeated the commands of the constitution of 1851, and said that cities and incorporated villages must be organized by general laws, and not by special acts conferring corporate powers.

“All our municipalities were left without law, without government and in a state of chaos. To ameliorate the evils of the situation the court postponed the execution of its decree until the general assembly could provide some sort of constitutional government for our cities and villages. This was a most perilous crisis, requiring extraordinary and immediate action. Only one thing remained to be done, and that was resorted to when the proper authority called upon the general assembly to meet in extra session on the 25th day of August.

“When it assembled it determined to draw the dividing line between cities and villages at 5,000 inhabitants and to make a law providing that aggregations of people of more than 5,000, at the last federal census, should be cities, and those with a less number of inhabitants should be villages. So it happens that in Ohio we have seventy-one cities possessing an aggregate population of more than 1,800,000, and varying in size from about 5,000 people to more than 381,000. To make one law which would provide for the wants of these unequal populations was indeed a great task. To add to the difficulties was the fact that for years all had been governed by dissimilar charters. The people of each city were more or less attached to its peculiar government. Each city had a representative or representatives in the legislative body, intent upon making effective the wishes of his or their constituents. It was a difficult matter to bring these elements to the support of one general law in sufficient numbers to secure its enactment. To fail was to leave our state without municipal government.

“There was one class of sincere men who persistently advocated what they termed the ‘federal plan’ for the government of cities, and energetically opposed all other schemes. Several years ago this plan was put into the form of special charters or laws, having application to two of the large cities in Ohio. This plan clothed the mayor with almost autocratic power, giving him the right, of his own will and without restriction, to appoint the chief executive officers of the city, and giving them the title of a cabinet. It gave to the mayor and his cabinet the right to occupy seats in the legislative branch of the government and to discuss measures therein pending. It gave the mayor and his cabinet remarkable power over legislation for the city by providing that certain ordinances should not be considered by the legislative branch until they had been approved by them. This plan had as sincere and more opponents than it had advocates, because it violated many of the vital principles upon which the federal government was built.

“Another class of citizens advocated a plan which provided that each city should hold a constitutional convention and be governed by the charter framed and adopted by that convention. This was called ‘home rule.’ Under it we would have as many forms of municipal government in the state as we had cities. By its adoption the general assembly would have attempted to delegate to each city a power which it did not itself possess. Under it we would have all the evils which the constitution of 1851 intended to prevent. It had many sincere advocates, but others believed that its adoption would be quickly declared by the Supreme Court to be a violation of the constitution itself.

“I have called your attention to these matters for the purpose of portraying the many difficulties which the legislature had to meet and overcome at its recent extra session. This continued until October 22, and the result is that we now have a law for the government of our cities and villages, not perfect, but uniform in its operation and in strict compliance with the constitution. Under it we have municipal government consisting of three branches—the legislative, the executive and the judicial.

“The legislative branch is a council, consisting, in cities of less than 25,000 inhabitants, of seven members, three of whom are elected by the people at large and four of whom are elected by wards—in cities of 25,000 to 40,000, of nine members, three of whom are elected by the people at large and six by wards—for every 15,000 inhabitants above 40,000, there is one additional member of council, and when the total membership of council is fifteen or more, one member of every five is elected at large and the remainder from wards. The president of the council is to be elected by the voters of the city, and in case of disability of the mayor, he fills the vacancy in this office. The thought which caused the council to be thus constituted was this: If malfeasance and corruption exist in a municipality it very frequently has its origin in the membership of the council. A small legislative body generally does better work than a large one. If the president of the council is elected by the people he will probably be a man of high standing and be free from personal obligations to the members who compose that body. The same is true of councilmen elected at large. The wards are composed of more people than heretofore, because it is believed that a larger constituency will have a tendency to place men of business ability, intelligence and integrity in council.

“The powers of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, of contracting debts and of loaning the credit of cities conferred upon council are restricted. In this respect, however, as well as in other matters, the council, of necessity, has large discretion, and it is of exceeding importance that the people should secure good men for councilmen.

“The executive officers are the mayor, auditor, treasurer, solicitor and a board of public service, consisting of three or five members, as may be determined by council, all of whom are elected by the people. The mayor is the chief executive officer of the city, and it is his duty to see that all ordinances, by-laws and resolutions of the council are faithfully obeyed and enforced; to supervise the expenditures of the revenues of the corporation, and if such expenditures exceed the revenues, to protest against such expenditures and cause such protest and reason therefor to be entered on the journal of the council. It is also his duty to supervise the conduct of all the officers of the corporation and inquire into the grounds of all complaints against any of them, and cause all violations of law or neglect of duty to be promptly punished or reported to the proper authority for correction. He is given the power to veto all ordinances or resolutions of council, but such veto may be overruled by a two-thirds vote of the council.

“It is the duty of the auditor to keep the books of the city, and at proper times to exhibit accurate statements of all moneys received and expended, and, generally, to keep a record of all the financial affairs of the city. The duties of the treasurer are such as are generally required of the treasurer of any corporation, and the same may be said of the duties of the solicitor or attorney of the city.

“The directors of public service are very important officers, because this board is the chief administrative authority of the city, manages and supervises all public works and all public institutions, makes all contracts authorized by council, sees that the same are faithfully executed, may employ such superintendents, clerks and other subordinate officers as may be necessary for the execution of the powers and duties of the department, and it may establish such subdepartments for the administration of affairs under its control as may be deemed proper.

“The code also provides for a department of public safety, which shall have the control and management of the police and fire departments. The board will consist of two or four members as may be provided by council. The directors will be appointed by the mayor with the consent of two-thirds of all the members elected to council; not more than half of these directors shall belong to the same political party, and in making appointments and filling vacancies, the mayor shall observe this requirement. The directors of public safety are clothed with all powers and duties connected with and incident to the appointment, regulation and government of the police and fire departments, and shall make all contracts with reference to the management of said department.

“The police force will be composed of a chief of police and such inspectors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, corporals, detectives, patrolmen and other employes as shall be provided by council. The fire force shall be composed of a chief of the department and such marshals, firemen and other employes as shall be provided by the same authority. The provisions of the code are such that all employes of the police and fire departments must be appointed upon their merits and not for political reasons. No member can be dismissed except for cause after fair notice and hearing. The object is to make these departments absolutely non-political and to secure an administration of them that will be in the interest of the public alone.

“Council has power to fix the number of members of which the boards of public service and of public safety shall consist, and to fix the compensation for all officers. This elasticity is provided so that the larger cities may be provided for and at the same time the code be not burdensome to the smaller ones.

“In the short time allotted to me I cannot consider all the provisions of this code. In general terms, I desire to say that under it we will have municipal government built upon the same principles which characterize the government of the United States. There will be three branches, the legislative, the executive and the judicial, each independent of the other, and each having its appropriate duties to perform without interference by the other or others. These principles have been held sacred in the federal and state governments, and are just as essential to the success and well-being of municipal governments.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“It provides that all contracts made and rights granted under pre-existing laws shall stand. This was required by good faith and of honest men. It does not make radical changes. It permits our cities in so far as possible to have the same rights and privileges as heretofore possessed and to do about the same things as formerly.

“It gives to the people the right to elect all their principal executive, legislative and judicial officers, and does not give to any one man the power to construct a personal machine. That we may have model municipal government in Ohio, but one thing remains to be done.

“That is for the people to take an interest in their own business and to look after it as they do after their private affairs, and to see that honest, efficient men are elected as municipal officers. Without such intelligent action by the people, no mere form of government will save their public business from disgrace and disaster.”

President Hoyt said: “Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York:—We all hold in precious memory our first president, Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, and we are favored to-night in having with us our first vice-president, Thomas Ewing, Jr., who will now address us, responding to the toast of ‘Ohio in Virginia.’” (Applause.)

Mr. Thomas Ewing, Jr., said: “I thank you, Mr. President, for your introduction, and I thank the members of the Ohio Society for the election which they have honored me with to-night. I may say that it is ‘Virginia in Ohio’ that I am to speak to and not ‘Ohio in Virginia.’ We have heard in this Society a good deal of New England in Ohio. As long ago as 1886 Mr. Mitchell made an address on the First Settlement and he told of the formation of the first Ohio Society at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern, in Boston, I believe, and of the two expeditions that started out the next year under its direction, one from Danvers, Mass., and the other from Hartford, Conn. Then our good friend, Judge Higley, followed Mr. Mitchell with an account of the Second Settlement, which was at Cincinnati, largely from Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Now I would not pluck one single leaf from the garland of honor of these first settlements or of the populous North which poured them from her frozen loins, but I want to say that somehow or other the North generally, and New England in particular, manage to get what they and she have done talked about more than their relative importance warrants. Ohio has produced a great historian, Mr. James Ford Rhodes, of Cleveland; but he had to go to Boston and settle down in order that he might receive a fair recognition. Fame seems to be a birthright of New England’s poets and philosophers and statesmen, and even of her emigrants. But in point of fact the part which Virginia played in the early settlement of Ohio is more important than that of all the rest of the country put together. Before the Revolutionary War she sent into the vast wilderness the Dunmore expedition, which won the great battle of Point Pleasant, where the Kanawha enters into the Ohio. Dunmore divided his troops into two divisions, passed up the Hockhocking and up the Scioto, and on the Pickaway Plains he made the Treaty of Peace with Logan, at which time that great savage warrior made the speech which Jefferson reported and which we all learned in our school books, closing with these proud and pathetic words: 'Logan would not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn him? Not one.'

"The reason for the importance of Virginia in the early settlement is very easy to explain. Kentucky and West Virginia were included within her territory. They bounded the state entirely on the south and half-way on the east; they commanded all the gateways pretty nearly into Ohio. Kentucky was itself already settled with a population of nearly two hundred thousand souls. They poured into this state their settlers from all directions. Virginia had the best title of any to the Northwest Territory and when she surrendered it she reserved practically one-sixth of the state for her Revolutionary soldiers in the tract known as the Virginia Military Bounty Lands. This tract embraces the entire right bank of the Scioto and extends backwards to the line of the towns of Springfield and Xenia and Madisonville and Linwood along the Little Miami River. It is a region of great beauty and of undying interest. The banks of the Scioto, the bottom lands there and the Pickaway Plains are the greatest cattle raising and grain producing part of the state. In Adams County there is the most remarkable of all the Indian remains of the West, a great mound 1,300 feet high, shaped like a serpent with an egg in its mouth—so remarkable that Harvard College has bought the land and turned it into a public park. In Highland County, in the Paint Creek region, there is a natural formation of such beauty and extraordinary character that it is known as the 'Wonderland of Ohio.' Perhaps some of the members who visited the Pan-American will remember the exhibit of prehistoric remains from Ross County. It was one of the most interesting things at the Exposition.

"Now it was into this country that Virginia sent her settlers. Three of the early governors of the state went from Virginia together in the year 1796. In fact, she supplied five of the governors of the state, and the names of those who came from Virginia or from Virginia families, names like Thurman and Allen and Harrison, and hundreds of others that might be mentioned, are household words with us all. If I may take a moment to refer to one or two of the settlers, one that looms up above them all I think was old Simon Kenton. Born in Fauquier County, Virginia, of Scotch-Irish stock, as most of these emigrants were, he went into the back region of Kentucky and became a great friend and companion of Daniel Boone. Becoming tired of staying about in the more settled part of Kentucky he went on a horse-stealing expedition into Ohio; was captured by the Indians, taken to Chillicothe and condemned to be burned at the stake. His life was saved by one of the greatest scoundrels and desperadoes of that time—Simon Girty—Girty, the man who had stood by and seen Crawford burned at the stake at Sandusky, but he had known Kenton as a boy and saved his life by artifices, which it is hardly necessary to speak about here.

“Kenton then after our state was admitted settled down at Ravenna, entered the army in the War of 1812 under General Harrison, and died in 1836 at a good old age. I believe that one of the first artistic efforts of our distinguished member, Mr. J. Q. A. Ward, was a statue of Kenton in his hunter's garb.

“Massie was another of the great settlers of Ohio who came from Virginia. He was the surveyor and the explorer of the Bounty Lands. He laid out the town of Manchester in 1791 and in 1796 laid out the town of Chillicothe. In 1807 Massie was elected—or ran for governor of the state—and was beaten by Return Jonathan Meigs on the face of the returns, but entered a contest and obtained the office, and then with the modesty that is a part of our priceless inheritance as Ohioans, he immediately resigned.

“Now there was grouped about Massie in Chillicothe a band of ardent young Democrats who were among the most notable men that Ohio ever knew. Democrats in the broad sense—democratic-republicans or republican-democrats as you choose—they were at that time Jeffersonian. Those of us who had the good fortune to hear Senator Foraker deliver his address at the dinner will remember his saying that while we thought perhaps he and Senator Hanna had had some hard things to say to each other, it wasn't a patching to what had been said between the different parties in 1801. He referred to the great contest which went on in Ohio between Massie and Worthington and Tiffin and those gathered about these men, mostly living in Chillicothe, on the one hand, and Arthur St. Clair, whose signature is on the back of those documents at the end of the table, on the other. St. Clair was the governor and he liked his job, had the true Ohio instinct; and these men were engaged in the effort to force the state into the Union. It was the most bitter contest probably Ohio has ever known. The result was that in 1802 St. Clair was removed from office by President Jefferson and the state admitted. Had it not been for that contest undoubtedly this Centennial which we are now celebrating would have been postponed some years.

“The result was that the state capital was fixed at Chillicothe and there it remained until 1816, when it was removed to Columbus. If I may be pardoned a moment's digression, prompted by town pride, I may say that the capital would have gone from Chillicothe to my old home town of Lancaster if our representative in the legislature had been a little more familiar with parliamentary forms. The bill for the removal of the capital had passed to its third reading. There was a strong feeling in favor of Lancaster. The bill was complete except that in the place of the name of the town for the new capital there was a blank and the member rose and moved to strike out the blank and insert Lancaster.

“But, gentlemen, it is not the beauty of this region nor the interest of it; it is not the great numbers of settlers nor their distinctive character nor their great services that we should fasten our attention on most to-night in considering the theme, ‘Virginia in Ohio.’ It is the fact that owing to Virginia’s influence more than any other one thing Ohio has had free labor and never slavery. Virginia, the mother, weighed down with slavery and unable to free herself from it, with one great magnanimous act of fostering care snatched for her fair child the precious boon of freedom as a heritage forever.

“I would like to say in closing that there is to-day and to-night in Chillicothe, Ohio, a celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the signing of the constitution, and it seems to me it would be a graceful thing if this Society should send some greeting.” (Applause.)

Chairman Hoyt said: “Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York:—I am now going to propose a wonder to you—the only living man that ever beat Joseph B. Foraker for any office. Gentlemen, I refer to ex-Governor, the Hon. James E. Campbell, who will now speak to you on ‘Ohio’s Constitutional Convention of 1802.’” (Applause.)

Ex-Governor James E. Campbell said: “I can stand it just as long as the rest of you. (This in response to continued applause.) Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Society:—I have been introduced in a variety of ways in my life, but I have so seldom beaten anybody I never was introduced before as ‘the man who beat.’ (Laughter and applause.) One of the things I am proud of, besides beating Governor Foraker, is that I am the oldest honorary member of this Society, and that I have made more speeches to the Society than any man living or dead; but I have always made them on occasions of the annual banquet, and have never attended one of these interesting business meetings with a banquet ‘on the side.’ I am charmed, I may say I am delighted. In all my experience I have never known dry reports that contained so much juicy matter. I cite, for instance, the reports of the treasurer and the auditing committee. It is the first time I have ever been in any kind of a business meeting where there was so much money on hand and nobody said, ‘Let’s declare a dividend.’ Of course I have no legal right to make that motion, not being a resident member. (Laughter.) I have never heard of such a remarkable case as that of one Penfield, who is holding the Society's cheque. I never held a cheque over night in my life, and here is a man who has a cheque—a good cheque—and has held it for months. I cannot account for it except upon the ground that he is an autograph collector. Speaking of autograph collectors reminds me that I have one cheque which I have held. It is about the last cheque ever drawn by Andrew Jackson upon a bank, and I am keeping that for an autograph.

“The report of the library committee was something interesting and the only report that seemed to lack completeness. The gentlemen report how many daily papers you had, and how many semi-weekly papers, but not how many ‘weakly’ papers. (Laughter and applause.) There was also an interesting controversy between Judge Higley and my old friend Foyé as to which gave this banquet. (Laughter and applause.) I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to sit on jury and attend a banquet to be given by each of them in the near future.

“I am also instructed and entertained by the speeches I have heard, and I agree most heartily as a son of Ohio who ought to have a large and intimate knowledge of Ohio people in your position, sir (to the chairman), that if there is anything needed in a Society of Ohio men anywhere on the face of the earth, that great necessity is a chaplain. (Laughter.) My friend, Kennedy, who often gives me a puff in the Plain Dealer (I am going to pay him back now, first chance I have had), certainly made one of the most eloquent speeches I have ever listened to, if he hadn't prefaced it with the ridiculous assertion that Trumbull was the greatest county in Ohio. Why, everybody knows that (until this year, when it went Republican for the first time in its history), Butler is the greatest county in Ohio. Since that election I am not claiming that it is the greatest; it used to be the greatest. The governor has come here to-night, and, having been governor myself, I sympathize with him in his trials on the subject of municipal law. I am glad, as a citizen of the state—for I live there and vote there if I do stay in New York more than I ought to—that we have at last reached some system of municipal law which is likely to give us honest and rigid municipal government, for if there is any crying evil in this country it is the rottenness, the corruption and the fraud that seem so far to have been inseparable evils in every great municipality. (Applause.) I congratulate the governor and I sincerely hope that his most sincere expectations may even be exceeded. I was glad to see the third Thomas Ewing coming to the front. (Applause.) I knew his father and admired and loved him, and I am now and always have been of the opinion that there was truth in the inscription emblazoned on that old picture of the racehorse you may remember to have seen in your young days, in which it says that ‘Blood will tell.’ (Applause.) And I am pleased with his speech on Virginians, because I am a double grandson of Virginia, that is to say, my grandfather (my father's father) was born in Virginia, and that makes me once a grandson of Virginia, and, in common with most of you, I am a son of Ohio, and Ohio is a daughter of Virginia, and that makes me twice a grandson of Virginia.

"I presume it is time to get around to my subject. I went into the library of the Ohio Society of New York, where they keep those 'weakly' papers the other night, and looked over such records and books as they had bearing upon the constitutional convention of 1802; and then I went to a stenographer and dictated a speech. I read it this evening before I came here and concluded it was not worth reading to you; but the subject, whether the speech be interesting or not, is a very interesting one. The state of Ohio is simply a part of that great northwest territory which comprised the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and a portion of Minnesota.

"To understand the constitutional convention of 1802 you must for a moment go back of that year. There was a controversy as to where this northwest territory was to go at the end of the Revolutionary War; and, just twenty years before the state constitution was made, in 1782, the commissioners on the part of the government of Great Britain and her revolted colonies in the United States were endeavoring to fix a boundary line. The American commissioners said it must be the chain of the great lakes, and the British commissioners said the Ohio River. Benjamin Franklin, probably the most astute man this country has ever produced, for some reason which at this distance does not appear to be clear, was in favor of yielding to the British commissioners, and let the boundary line be the Ohio River; but Jay and Adams said, 'No, we will go back to America and carry on war forever before we will give up the line of the Great Lakes.' (Great applause.) And they carried the day, and that is why Ohio is a part of the United States and not a part of the Dominion of Canada. Then five years later came the great Ordinance of 1787, an Ordinance sometimes attributed to Thomas Jefferson, but really belonging in every essential to Nathan Dane. There are two things in that ordinance that must be mentioned before you come to the constitutional convention. The first is this declaration: 'There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude.' Bear in mind that slavery then existed almost all over this country, not as we had it forty years ago in the South, but nearly every state in the union was a slave state. None were so strenuous for slavery when the Constitution of the United States was made as the Northern states. The second declaration as embodied and written into that great ordinance is, 'Schools and means of education shall be encouraged forever.' That is the language of the ordinance of 1787; and, before these great men met at Chillicothe in 1802, there was a chart laid down and this territory of the Northwest, and with it the future state of Ohio, was before their day dedicated to freedom and intelligence. So in 1802 the constitutional convention was called. Prior to that time, however, the territory northwest of the Ohio River had been divided into two territories. A line was run north and south, being the line now between the states of Ohio and Indiana, but extending clear to the Straits of Mackinaw. There were ten counties in the Eastern Territory, nine counties included in the limits of the present state of Ohio, and the county of Wayne, which now includes the eastern part of Michigan. These two territories, so far as I know, had no names. Research fails to discover that they were named, and the constitutional convention which met at Chillicothe in 1802 recites the fact in these words: 'The people in the Eastern Division of the territory northwest of the Ohio River.' But they end that great document, the constitution of 1802, by declaring in the very last words that they create a state 'by the name of the state of Ohio.' (Applause.) So that this day—the 29th day of November—is really the day we celebrate, because, whatever controversy may arise as to the exact date when the state was admitted into the Union, it is unquestionably a fact that one hundred years ago to-day the state of Ohio was named, and christened, and we are celebrating now the baptism, if you may so state it, of that great commonwealth to which we all turn, whether far or near, with so much love and veneration. (Applause.)

“Mr. Ewing has depicted accurately the controversy that raged in the constitutional convention. There was a state party and an anti-state party; there was a Democratic party headed by Massie and Tiffin, and a Federalist party headed by St. Clair. There were also personal animosities, for our forefathers were built rather on fighting lines. The most curious thing about the constitutional convention of 1802 is that it was never called by any action taken on the part of the inhabitants of the territory. Congress early in 1802 passed a law directing the people of the territory to select delegates to a constitutional convention, but the law was passed against the active, vigorous, determined opposition of the delegate from the territory; and there was much rancor in the debate over the idea that Congress should in a highhanded manner, and without previous notice on the part of anybody, direct the people of the territory to do thus and so. It was unfortunately on the States Rights idea, then existing in Connecticut and other northern states as well as the South, that Mr. Griswold, of Connecticut, a member of Congress, upon the floor of the house declared that the passage of that bill meant the destruction of all the states. Congress, however, after directing the people to organize the state, gave them the privilege of selecting their delegates; but that is all the privilege the people ever had. They were never permitted to ratify the constitution—never permitted to say whether the constitution as made suited them or not. The convention met on the first day of November, labored industriously for four weeks, adopted the constitution on the 29th, and by a vote of 27 to 7 that they would not let the people ratify it, and went home—never said as much as ‘by your leave’ to their trusting constituents. I can imagine that if a constitutional convention in Ohio to-day would go off in that happy fashion and say to the people, ‘You can take this or do something better,’ what would be said and what would be done by the people of Ohio. So looking back over one hundred years we must say to ourselves, and say it with some pleasure and exultation, that we have done a good deal in the last century in the direction of the ‘reign of the common people.’

“Of the thirty-five men sent to this convention from the nine counties of the state, all of them, except two from the great county of Trumbull (laughter), lived in the southern half of the state, which would indicate that the northern half of Ohio was lagging behind. Whether it does now or not (having come from the southern part of the state) I am not called upon to say. They were nearly all—perhaps all—Revolutionary soldiers, and every one was a man of high personal character. I cannot stop in the brief space here to name you the list, but there are a dozen perhaps who have made such a mark in the history of Ohio that they ought to have some larger mention.

“The president of the convention was Edward Tiffin. Tiffin was an Englishman by birth—and, by the way, the only man born off of our soil who was ever governor of Ohio. He was a doctor, and he had also taken holy orders as a deacon—ordained by Bishop Asbury. I find that several other members of that convention had been ordained, from which I infer that the average of piety was higher in that day than now. He came to Chillicothe. He must have had some high notions of labor, for he manumitted his own slaves—he was a slaveholder—before he came there, and at once took active rank as one of the leading men of the state. When the constitution was adopted he became the first governor. He resigned that office to become United States senator. Subsequently he became commissioner of the general land office and was the only public officer in Washington when the capitol was burned in 1814 who saved all of his archives. This shows that the Ohio man was just as active in that day as he is now.

“Thomas Worthington was another governor. Worthington and Tiffin were brothers-in-law. Tiffin became first governor and Worthington one of the first senators. Then Tiffin went to the senate and Worthington became governor, and it was those two men, and with them Trimble, afterwards also governor, let us remember, who came to Chillicothe together. If we had three young fellows come to Ohio now, and all three of them got to be governors we would call that a 'Trust.' (Laughter.) I don't know what they called it then.

"Samuel Huntington, another member of that convention, became governor. Huntington was from Trumbull county—I feel I ought to mention Trumbull county as often as possible. Huntington was first a Judge of the Supreme Court and afterwards became governor; and was a rigid Puritan of the most ultra type. He came there from Connecticut. Worthington, I may say, came from Virginia.

"Thomas Kirker became governor in an odd way. When Governor Tiffin resigned to go to the United States Senate Kirker was Speaker of the House, and, by virtue of that office, became governor, and he held onto that governorship until the next election. Then when that modest Virginian who emigrated to Ohio—and when I speak of emigrate that makes me think how appropriate it is that you gentlemen who have emigrated from Ohio here deposit your money in the 'Emigrants' Bank.' (Great laughter.) When Nathaniel Massie declined the governorship, Kirker still held on another year until the next election.

"The fifth member of that convention who became governor of Ohio was Jeremiah Morrow. Morrow went out of the convention into Congress and for ten years was the sole Representative from the state of Ohio to the Federal Congress and then became governor. The Duke of Saxe Weimar, who visited him at his country place down in Warren county in that crude and early day, when he went back to Europe, said that he had found in the wilds of Ohio a 'veritable Cincinnatus.' Governor Morrow undoubtedly was as near a type of Cincinnatus as modern days have produced; probably the ablest and greatest man in that convention.

"Nathaniel Massie, a Virginian of the cavalier type, was a very prominent member. He was noted for his graceful manners and high bred courtesy. He was the first Speaker of the House of Representatives. General Joseph Darlington, also a Virginian, had been a soldier of distinction. Benjamin Ives Gilman had the reputation of being the handsomest and most dignified member. John Reily, a South Carolinian, had participated in many Revolutionary battles. John Goforth, a Jerseyman, was later largely instrumental in establishing the present system of selling government lands. John Smith, while living in the city of Cincinnati, went to the United States Senate and became intimate with Aaron Burr, who was then vice-president of the United States and president of the Senate. Smith became a great friend to Burr and was fascinated by Burr's personality, which according to all historians and biographers was almost irresistible. They were so intimate that when Burr's treason developed Smith was indicted. He never was tried, and the verdict of posterity is that he was not guilty.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“I might go on and name others. Take, for instance, those two great members of the Ohio Company that came to Marietta—Rufus Putnam and Ephraim Cutler. Why, the early history of Ohio could not be written without the names of Rufus Putnam and Ephraim Cutler, who were here at the very beginning of the Buckeye state.

“But you do not want to know altogether the personality of these men—a few words only as to what they did. Right here I will digress just a moment. They adjourned on the 29th day of November and the controversy has raged from that day to this as to whether that was the day that Ohio became a state. I find that the Federal Census Reports put down Ohio as admitted to the Union on November 29, 1802, but my own opinion is that (except inferentially) Ohio never was formally admitted to the Union. The convention adjourned on the 29th of November. On the first Tuesday in January, 1803, the state elected a governor and other officers, and a legislature. On the last day of March, 1803, the legislature began its session, and on the 3d day of March the governor was inaugurated. In the meantime, on the 19th of February, Congress passed a law—what?—to admit the state of Ohio? No, the title of the Act is to ‘extend the federal laws to the state of Ohio.’ That is the title of the Act, which recites the existing situation by saying, ‘Ohio has become one of the United States of America,’ but as to whether Ohio was in existence on the 19th day of February, 1803, whether it was born that day or some other day, the controversy will rage forever. My own opinion is that the state was like Topsy—it never was born, it ‘just growed.’

“There were some curious things in the constitution of 1802. The one that was most remarkable was the adoption of a constitution without giving to the governor the veto power. That is an anomaly, absolutely an anomaly, under our political system. No one at this date pretends to defend or uphold a proposition of that kind, and so far as I know there are not more than two or three states in the Union where the governor does not have the veto power. The veto is to a constitution what the brake on the coach and the hold-back strap on the harness are to a stage coach, and four horses going down hill on a full gallop. Without the veto power you have practically changed your form of government. There must be some explanation. You must not jump to the conclusion that the fathers of the constitution had no knowledge of the checks and balances that ought to exist in a republican form of government, but they were led, as most men are and always will be by bitter personal feelings, surroundings and animosities. It arose in this way. Arthur St. Clair had been territorial governor—was governor of the territory when this convention met. Most of these men had served in the territorial legislature. St. Clair was a great soldier, in spite of some vicissitudes in his career, a born general and an honest man. He was a favorite of George Washington, but he was a stubborn, hard-headed Scotchman—I do not speak in derogation of the Scotch for I am Scotch myself, but you know the Scotch have a reputation of being a little ‘sot in their way’ and St. Clair was one of the most stubborn type. The first session of the legislature passed thirty laws and Governor St. Clair vetoed eleven of them, annulled more than one-third of the legislation of a new territory starting on its career. He not only vetoed laws, but refused to return them to the House from which they originated within ten days, although they requested him to return them to see if they could not be amended to suit his views. On the contrary, he rated them soundly for their impertinence to the governor. His idea of the veto power was that there were three Houses—the House, the Senate and St. Clair; that he was a coördinate branch of the legislature. As a natural result of his extraordinary application of the veto power the idea of the veto became absolutely hateful to the entire people of the territory regardless of political convictions. Then St. Clair made himself very unpopular by controversies as to sub-dividing counties, and as to judicial matters, and kept up a constant irritation between himself and members of the legislature. An illustration of the disesteem in which he was regarded, arose when the convention met. He, being the governor, asked the privilege of addressing the convention at length. By the majority of five they voted that ‘Arthur St. Clair, Esquire, should be permitted to address them,’ which could not be called a very warm and pressing invitation. That is the way in which Ohio came to have the unique and unenviable distinction of being one of the very few states where the executive does not have the power of veto.

“There was another thing that caused probably as much trouble as it did forty years ago in this country, and that was the color line. There were, perhaps, 150 free negroes in the territory and the question was what to do with them. Should they be citizens, and if not what should they be? At last after much controversy the word ‘white’ was put into the constitution of Ohio by the narrow vote of 19 to 14, and there it stood until it was washed out in the blood of thousands of her best and bravest sons sixty years afterwards. But if the free negroes made trouble those that were in slavery, and might be brought in, made a lot more trouble. Fortunately this territory so far as Congress could control, and so far as Virginia was concerned, was dedicated to freedom; but a crowd in the legislature—I am sorry to say they were known as the Virginia crowd, too—wanted some modified form or term of slavery; and, in that convention, Ohio was made a free state, but it was by just one vote, just one majority, that a plank in the constitution was defeated which provided that black men should be slaves until they were thirty-five and black women until they were twenty-five. That majority of one was obtained because Putnam got Cutler to go to Milligan and shame him by showing the speeches that he (Milligan) had made in the legislature against slavery, and thus got him to change his vote. So our heritage of freedom came pretty near slipping away from us. That was the history of the colored man in the days of our forefathers.

“In some respects 1802 was a day of small things. Money was scarce. No scarcer than it is sometimes nowadays when they pay 300 per cent. for money down on Wall Street; but it was pretty scarce, and they fixed the salaries on a scale that was in accordance with these conditions. They provided that the governor should not be paid more than $1,000, or any member of the Supreme Court more than $1,000. They provided that the Supreme Court should sit around in the counties. The counties were many of them remote from books, sparsely settled, and the judges occasionally unlearned in the law. The result was that by holding the Supreme Court in every county, the Court in one county decided a question in one way and in another county another way, and in some other county they would still decide it in a different way, and that little discrepancy had to be wiped out subsequently by other enactments. But in spite of the few defects in that constitution its excellencies were so great and its results so marvelous that we cannot but look back one hundred years and say to ourselves, where could there be found a population of less than forty thousand (according to the governor’s speech just delivered there are forty-five times forty thousand people to-day in the state of Ohio alone; there are thirty counties in the state that have more than forty thousand people) a body of men equal to those thirty-five who gathered at Chillicothe and completed their great work one hundred years ago to-day? The quality of the men that sent them there had something to do with that. The men that sent them there, as well as the men who were sent, were almost without exception soldiers of the Revolution; and they represented all the great strains and races that came into the state of Ohio immediately after that war. There were from Virginia both the Cavalier and the Scotch-Irish type. There were the Puritan from Connecticut and Massachusetts. There was the Knickerbocker from New York; the Pennsylvania Dutchman from the Keystone state; the sturdy Jerseyman; the Huguenot from South Carolina. The very best of these races came in, and it must have been a great combination of blood because, after it had mingled and commingled for sixty years, it produced in a great crisis and upon a sudden call and in one outburst, more generals and statesmen than all the other states in the Union together. Those men of various types picked out their thirty-five delegates. Many of the thirty-five were scholars, men of learning, and all had been schooled in honor and manhood. They were indeed a great body, and we can justly and proudly stand here to-night and say: 'Men of 1802, we salute you. We shall ever keep your memory green.'" (Great applause.)

President Hoyt said: "The Ohio Society of New York had hoped that a committee might be appointed to escort the governor of the state of New York to the Ohio Society, from a club on Fifth Avenue where he is being entertained, and it is with great regret that we have not been able to succeed. We shall hope most sincerely that he may be with us at our annual banquet on the 17th of January. Just one word for the benefit of the gentleman who has just spoken (Governor Campbell) and who seems to think that the northern counties were very backward in their progress in the past. Gentlemen, for his benefit I wish to say that of the members in the Ohio Society of New York, 112 of them come from the city of Cleveland alone, on the bank of Lake Erie, and nearly one-half of the number elected during this past year came from that city, and Cincinnati is only a good second, with 71. It behooves ex-Governor Campbell to see that Cincinnati keeps up her quota, for the northern portion of the state will always take care of her share.

"Gentlemen, one word before we part. Under your constitution I, as president, have the duty of appointing your several committees for the coming year, except the house committee, which is appointed by your governing board. I believe in new blood. I believe also in not losing the old blood. I want any suggestions from any member between now and the middle of December, and I assure you that it will receive careful consideration on my part. In this vast metropolis, no one man can be expected to know all others or what they can do, and I rely upon you to let me know the men who are capable of filling positions on these different committees and to write me suggestions in that respect, and I can assure you they will receive careful consideration, and when I get through with my work and the committees are appointed I am sure that you will grant me indulgence if all the suggestions have not been carried out.

"Just one word further. We are through with our set speeches, but we have to-night with us a new vice-president, the Hon. John J. McCook, one of the 'Fighting McCooks' from Ohio. I saw him one moment ago. I know he is not so modest. I want him to say a word. We want to hear, gentlemen, from our vice-president, Col. John J. McCook, before we go." (Applause.)

Colonel McCook said: "At this hour of the night it would be an act of unkindness and not a proper return for the consideration that this Society has shown me, by addressing you to say anything more than to thank them most heartily for the great honor they have done me. When I came into the room to-night and took my seat at the table I looked at gentlemen on the platform and I thought they were the finest looking set of men I had ever seen. A few minutes later I spoke to the governor and I began to think what a wonderful state Ohio was. If all the men born there had stayed there, there would not have been room to stand up; and if all these men had stayed there it is a question how the rest of the world would have been able to struggle along with the remainder.

“I am very proud to have been here to-night. I appreciate the work Virginia did in the convention. Let us not forget that the clause that prohibited slavery in the Ordinance of 1787 was the sixth clause in order; the one that was inserted at the end of the debate and at the end of a very hard fight by members from Virginia; but do not let us forget what was involved in that awful curse of slavery which came to us from the North or from the South or wherever it came—it called for the blood of Ohio as well as the other states, and the Southern states as well, to wipe it out. Don't let us have any false ideas or any false laudation of praise for those men that left us that curse, from which Ohio was saved by this 6th Section and was a free state from the beginning, and may God ever keep her free.” (Great applause.)

President Hoyt: “Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York:—Your chairman fully appreciates the work of your banquet committee in preparing for our annual banquet, and it gives me great pleasure to announce that the seventeenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York will take place at the Waldorf-Astoria, on Saturday evening, January 17th, next.”

On December 8th James G. Newcomb was unanimously elected chairman of the governing committee. The following gentlemen were appointed to the house committee: Andrew J. C. Foyé, Leonard D. Morrison and Evarts L. Prentiss. At the meeting of the Society on the same date, Mr. Southard, as chairman of the committee to report on a change in the by-laws to provide for a historian and chaplain, reported Article VIII as follows, which was adopted:

“ARTICLE VIII—At the regular meeting of the Society in December of each year, three standing committees of five members each shall be appointed, viz.: a committee on literature and art, an entertainment committee, an auditing committee, a historian and a chaplain.”

President Hoyt appointed the following committees to serve for the ensuing year, they to select their own chairman, regardless of the order in which they are named: Literature and art: R. C. Penfield, Chas. H. Niehaus, George D. M. Peixotto, William S. Hawk, James G. Newcomb: entertainment: Oscar B. Thomas, A. W. Gillmore, Merrill Watson, Warren Higley, David Homer Bates, Jr.; library: Winchester Fitch, J. Sherlock

Davis, Mahlon Chance, P. Tecumseh Sherman, Orrel A. Parker; auditing: Louis D. Clarke, Charles L. Paar, Warner Ells, E. H. Childs.

President Hoyt announced that he had previously appointed James H. Kennedy as first official historian of the Society, and Bishop William A. Leonard, of the Northern (Episcopal) diocese of Ohio, the first official chaplain. The historian was directed to have the speeches delivered at the next annual banquet stenographically reported, that they might be preserved in permanent and accurate form.

Mr. Ewing called the attention of the Society to the fact that at Chillicothe in the succeeding May there would be held an elaborate celebration of the admission of the state of Ohio one hundred years ago, and he moved that a committee be appointed by the chair to look after the matter, so that the Ohio Society of New York might be properly represented. Mr. Ewing suggested that Mr. Southard be made chairman of this committee. The motion was carried and the chair said that he would appoint the committee later.

At the gathering of January 12, 1903, the following resolutions in honor of the memory of Gen. Wager Swayne, one of the former presidents, were read by Judge Higley, in the absence of General Burnett, chairman of the memorial committee:

“WHEREAS, General Wager Swayne, who has been an active member of this Society from its organization, its second honored president for three years, and foremost in every good word and work looking to the happiness and betterment of his fellow members and the peace and prosperity of the Society which he so much loved, after a lingering illness which he passed through with remarkable Christian fortitude and resignation, departed this life on the 18th day of December, 1902, to the inexpressible sorrow of all those who had for long years admired and loved him for his noble qualities of mind and heart, “Therefore, be it resolved by the Ohio Society of New York, that in the death of Gen. Wager Swayne, this Society has sustained a great and irreparable loss. That by his death his beloved state of Ohio, this city of his adoption and the whole nation have lost a most distinguished and loyal citizen, who was ever faithful and active in promoting civic reform, and improving the condition of his fellowmen.

“That his devotion to his church and the exemplification of her teaching in his life, were unailing at all times, yet wholly unostentatious and simple, while they gave unmistakable evidence of his perennial hope and abiding faith.

“That General Swayne’s high ideals of honor, Christian charity and personal purity, his devotion to his duty, his kind, generous, loving, helpful nature, won for him the respect and affectionate regard of all who knew him.

“His love for his country, his enthusiastic patriotism, was a most prominent attribute of his splendid manhood, and obedient to its call, he bravely fought for the honor of the flag on many a bloody battlefield and fairly won the laurels that justly belong to the brave soldier and chivalrous leader of men. When the war was over and the victory won, and this brave and crippled soldier retired to private life and the duties of his profession, his devotion to humanity, to his country and to his God, continued with increasing measure to the end.

“Resolved, That these resolutions be recorded in the minutes of the Society, and an engrossed copy of the same be sent to Mrs. Swayne.

“HENRY L. BURNETT,

“WARREN HIGLEY,

“M. I. SOUTHARD,

“H. B. BRUNDRETT,

“ANDREW J. C. FOYE, Committee.”

These resolutions were unanimously adopted and engrossed and sent to the family of General Swayne. President Hoyt announced the death of Gen. Samuel Thomas, a member of the Society, and the following were appointed to prepare resolutions in honor of his memory: Messrs. L. D. Morrison, Emerson McMillin, James H. Kennedy and David Homer Bates.

Mr. Kennedy, the historian, suggested that a brief and comprehensive history of the Society be prepared and printed some time in the next year or two, in a modest but artistic manner, and that future historians add a monograph each year of succeeding proceedings. Mr. Watson moved that the committee on library cooperate with the historian and report a definite plan of action at the next meeting. The motion was carried.

CHAPTER XVIII

IT detracts in no degree from the successful character of the historic value of the sixteen previous banquets of the Ohio Society of New York, to say that the one given at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, on the evening of January 17, 1903, was the largest and perhaps the most important of any in a long series of notable events.

It was given to the Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State for the United States, an honorary member of the Society, and for some years an honored and beloved son of Ohio by adoption. This eminent statesman, diplomat, poet, and man of letters was present and spoke, and the occasion was also made memorable by the presence, as guests of the Society, of the Ambassadors from Russia, Mexico, Italy, Great Britain and Austro-Hungary; of the Chargé d'Affaires of the French Embassy; and the Chargé d'Affaires of the German Embassy—the two distinguished gentlemen last named representing their nations in the absence from the United States of the Ambassadors from France and Germany. The official titles of the distinguished diplomatic guests were as follows:

Comte Cassini, Russian Ambassador, and Acting Dean of the Diplomatic Corps.

Señor de Azpiroz, Mexican Ambassador.

Signor Edmondo Mayor des Planches, Italian Ambassador.

Sir Michael H. Herbert, British Ambassador.

Mr. Ladislaus Hengelmuller von Hengervar, Austro-Hungarian Ambassador.

Mr. Pierre de Margerie, Chargé d'Affaires of French Embassy.

Count A. von Quadt Wykradt Isny, Chargé d'Affaires of the German Embassy.

There were also present, as other distinguished guests and orators of the evening, the Hon. Marcus A. Hanna, Senator from Ohio; the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, Senator from New York; and the Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland. The names of those invited to seats at the right and left of Colgate Hoyt, president of the Ohio Society of New York, and toastmaster of the evening, were as follows:

The Diplomatic Dinner was not only a great success in this wider meaning of the word, but in point of attendance it was the largest of any of the annual dinners given. Tickets for members and their friends were sold to the number of 537, and the total number of those who sat down in the banquet hall of the Waldorf-Astoria was 567; exclusive of the 350 ladies who at a later hour of the evening graced the occasion by their presence in the boxes.

The first steps taken in preparation for the event assumed the form of a suggestion made by President Hoyt, in the stated meeting for October, 1902, that the time had come for the appointment of a special committee to take charge of this event. Authority was conferred upon the president by vote to name a banquet committee, and at the meeting of November Mr. Hoyt obeyed these instructions by announcing that the gentlemen named below had been selected to serve in that capacity:

Milton I. Southard, chairman; Whitelaw Reid, Warren Higley, David H. Bates, Leander H. Crall, John D. Archbold, Louis D. Clarke, Samuel Mather, Thomas H. Wheeler, L. C. Weir, Albert F. Hagar, Lowell M. Palmer, Mahlon Chance, George E. Armstrong, H. S. Julier, Emory A. Stedman, Samuel H. Parsons, treas.; Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Andrew J. C. Foyé, John J. McCook, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Anson G. Mc-

Cook, Paul D. Cravath, William S. Hawk, Evarts L. Prentiss, George W. Perkins, Francis B. Stedman, Julius E. French, Jay O. Moss, Henry D. Lyman, E. B. Thomas, James H. Kennedy, Francis M. Applegate, secretary.

The reception and other committees, appointed at a later date, were constituted as follows:

Hon. Whitelaw Reid, chairman; Samuel Mather, Warren Higley, Flamen B. Candler, John T. Granger, P. S. Jennings, J. Sherlock Davis, S. Frederick Taylor, Orrel A. Parker, Warner Ells, H. H. Brockway, P. Tecumseh Sherman, Willard Abbott, Francis X. Butler, Charles D. Hilles, J. M. Chandler, C. B. Brown, Andrew Ernest Foyé, secretary; H. B. Brundrett, A. D. Juilliard, E. C. Bodman, Cass Gilbert, L. D. Morrison, Patrick Ryan, Charles A. Clegg, E. J. Wheeler, Addison W. Gilmore, N. C. Raff, Winchester Fitch, Merrill Watson, William H. Caldwell, L. C. Ruch, E. H. Childs, J. J. Crawford.

A sub-committee to look after the lady guests in the galleries: Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; Warner Ells, Francis X. Butler, Charles D. Hilles, Addison W. Gilmore, L. C. Ruch.

Committee to act as special escorts of the ambassadors:

John Hay, Colgate Hoyt.
Comte Cassini, Whitelaw Reid.
Senor de Aspiroz, Warren Higley.
Signor des Planches, Thomas Ewing, Jr.
Sir Michael H. Herbert, Henry L. Burnett.
M. von Hengervar, Milton I. Southard.
M. de Margerie, A. D. Juilliard.
Count von Quadt Isny, P. Tecumseh Sherman.

An attempt had been made upon several previous occasions to secure the attendance of Secretary Hay as the guest of the Society, but other engagements had prevented his acceptance. When President Hoyt received instructions and authority from the Society to proceed with the arrangements for the banquet of 1903, he immediately proceeded to Washington and called upon the distinguished head of the State Department. His mission upon this occasion was a success. But the acceptance was coupled with the condition that he must not be expected to speak; a hard condition, indeed, that was eventually removed. With this acceptance, Mr. Hoyt and his loyal associates of the committee proceeded upon their equally difficult task of securing the attendance of the ambassadors of the great nations represented in Washington.

The first call was made upon Herr von Holleben, ambassador from Germany, and dean of the diplomatic corps, who was found to be most cordial, and entered heartily into the plans, largely out of his admiration and affection for Secretary Hay. By personal calls upon each ambassador before the formal invitations were sent, assurances were received of their universal acceptance. As the representative of Austro-Hungary had not yet been made an ambassador, no invitation was sent to him until he had been received and accredited by our government. The absence from the country of the ambassadors of France and Germany at the time of the banquet, led to invitations being extended to the chargé d'affaires of each of these nations. It was afterwards found that the ladies of the diplomatic corps would be glad to come over, and they were invited, and accepted, with the exception of the wife of Baron Hengelmüller, the ambassador from Austro-Hungary, who was prevented by indisposition. A box in the gallery of the Waldorf was set apart for their use.

President Hoyt went to Washington a number of times and performed no end of labor before the thousand and one details of an affair of this importance could be arranged. When the day set for the banquet arrived, it found him in Washington with his private car for the transportation of the guests to New York. He was met there by Whitelaw Reid, chairman of the reception committee, who, with Mrs. Reid, was the guest of President Roosevelt at the White House.

In addition to Mr. Hoyt's car, a Pullman chair car was chartered, in order to give ample accommodations to the party, and, through the courtesy of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, a combination baggage car was provided for the servants and baggage, and the train was run as a special all the way from Washington to New York. The departure was made at 10 a. m., and this city was reached at 3:15 p. m.. The guests were met by the special committee and escorted to the Manhattan Hotel, where, through the generous courtesy of the proprietor, William S. Hawk, a member of the Ohio Society, they were entertained free of charge.

It may be said here that the chairman of the reception committee, Mr. Reid, did not content himself with most admirably fulfilling the duties of that position, but on Sunday following the banquet entertained the guests from Washington with a luncheon at his city home. They then returned to Washington in Mr. Hoyt's car, and their expressions of pleasure at all that had befallen them were the crowning features of a most happy event.

When the members and their guests began to arrive, they found gentlemen of the banquet committee and of the reception committee on hand to make them welcome. The badges worn by those first named consisted of a buckeye with ribbons of red, green and gold. Those of the other committee consisted of a buckeye, and colors of white, green and gold. As this was a dinner to diplomats, the buckeyes that served with such honorable distinction were secured from a tree grown upon the farm at Mansfield, Ohio, of Hon. John Sherman, once secretary of state for the United States.

Each gentlemen present received a handsome souvenir which he will cherish and hand down to his descendants as a precious heirloom. It was a plate in colors manufactured in Ohio especially for this occasion, from Ohio materials, by the hands of Ohio artists and workmen. It came from the factory of the Knowles, Taylor & Knowles Company, of East Liverpool, Ohio. On one side was a portrait of Hon. John Hay, with buckeyes around the border. On the reverse was this inscription:

OF THE

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

AT THE

WALDORF-ASTORIA

New York

IN HONOR OF

HON. JOHN HAY

Secretary of State of the United States

January 17, 1903

The programme which each found at his plate was a neat and artistic piece of work, prepared by Thomas A. Sindelar, an Ohio man in New York. It consisted of heavy cardboard, ten by twelve inches in size, the leaves of which were held together by a white silk ribbon. On the front was the United States coat-of-arms in red, white, blue, gold and green. The frontispiece was a fine portrait of Colonel Hay, and opposite this was an engraved order of toasts. Then followed the names of the banquet committee and the menu, while on the final outside page was the seal of the Ohio Society of New York.

Across the farther end of the banquet hall was a dais for the toastmaster and the guests. The room was filled with round tables, and all were decorated with flowers. The Star Spangled Banner was in evidence. A solid wall composed of national flags was behind the chair of the president. Immediately back of Secretary Hay hung his portrait framed in American flags. The shields of Ohio and New York were displayed to the right and left, also surrounded by flags, as were also the national insignia of those great countries whose representatives were among the guests of the evening.

While the Society members and their guests were enjoying the more material portions of this buckeye feast, the ladies who had accompanied the guests from Washington were entertained at dinner at the Manhattan Hotel. At 8:45 they were called for by members of the special sub-committee of the reception committee, named heretofore, and escorted to the Waldorf-Astoria, and shown into the boxes reserved for their use.

Immediately preceding the speechmaking, the ladies, who had come also as guests of the members, took their seats in the boxes, each seat and each box being numbered, coupon tickets for the same having been issued in advance. It was a brilliant scene that confronted the toastmaster when he arose. The floor of the banquet hall was filled with expectant men. The two spacious galleries were filled with hundreds of beautiful women, adorned with brilliant costumes and flowers and gems. A string orchestra in the upper gallery had furnished delightful music all through the feast.

When the hour for dinner arrived the members and their guests entered the banquet hall, and each finding his place, stood until the president and the distinguished guests at his table had entered and taken their places. The Right Rev. William A. Leonard, bishop of Ohio, the first chaplain of the Ohio Society of New York, said grace, and all were seated.

When the material feast was concluded President Hoyt arose and opened the intellectual portion by a few words of introduction, as follows:

Mr. Hoyt said: "Ladies and Gentlemen, our Honored Guests, and Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York: In the name of the Society I bid you a most cordial welcome to this, its seventeenth annual banquet. In speaking of the ladies, I am reminded of what a toastmaster said presiding at one of the banquets I attended this winter. In looking up at the ladies in the galleries he spoke of them as being in heaven. With that sentiment I most decidedly disagree, for two reasons: First, if the ladies are up in heaven the inference is quite strong that we men down below here must be in the other place. And second, while we are all free to acknowledge that the ladies are always nearer heaven than we men, we most sincerely hope that none of them will reach the Celestial City until we men may have the opportunity of accompanying them also. (Laughter and applause.)

"The Ohio Society of New York was the first state organization formed in this city, and it is by far the strongest, and the year just closed marks the most successful year in its history. During the past year twice as many members have been added to its rolls as in any previous year; more than fifty per cent. has been added to its cash assets, and to-night it greets you without a dollar of debt and more than ten thousand dollars in its treasury.

"Death has taken from us during the past year six, one of them the second president of this Society, General Wager Swayne, whom we all miss so much and loved so well.

“ We Ohio men believe in spelling Nation with a capital N, but we also believe in spelling Ohio with a very large O. We are proud of our native state, and well we may be, for all she has accomplished in the past; for what she is accomplishing in the present, and for what she will accomplish in the future. We most decidedly believe in these state organizations. We believe in the love of country, but we believe in the love of home equally, and these state organizations help to keep alive and to foster in our hearts the good that our mothers and fathers and early associates taught us in the homes of our childhood. As another has well said, ‘ Give me the first seven years of the education of a boy and the molding of his character and I care little who has him thereafter.’ There is nothing truer than the fact that whatever honor Ohio men have brought to their country, that whatever creditable service they have been enabled to render to this, their adopted city, has been due in no small measure to the training and early influences of those dear to us in our Ohio homes. (Applause.)

“ As I said before, therefore, we heartily believe in these state organizations in this great city, and while we congratulate ourselves on what this Society has done and is doing, we should by no means be satisfied with the present. It is estimated that there are over fifteen thousand Ohioans in the city of New York, and instead of resting on our laurels with a membership of five hundred, we ought not to be satisfied until at least the better portion of these fifteen thousand are on our rolls. We love our country and our flag and we love this our adopted city, but may God grant we may never love less the homes of our childhood and the associations for good clustering about them.

“ The world knows that the Ohio men are a most modest body of men, but notwithstanding our great modesty we cannot help being very proud of this magnificent gathering to-night. We are doubly proud of the honored guests that grace our presence this evening, and we defy any other society to gather together in this or any other banquet hall such an array of distinguished men as are here to-night. (Applause.) I have a telegram of regret from Governor Nash stating that official business at the last moment detained him so that it was impossible for him to be present and wishing me in his name to extend his warm wishes to all the Buckeye friends gathered here to-night. I also received this afternoon a note of regret from Mr. Carnegie stating that he was exceedingly anxious to be here to-night, but at the last moment his physician would not allow him to come; and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Sr., only two hours ago had to send a telegram declining to be here to-night. There is one other, Mr. Augustus Thomas, that some of you heard from a year ago, the president of the Missouri Society, who, unfortunately, is confined to his house with grip and therefore cannot be here. With these exceptions all our invited guests are with us, and I am happy to say, and it is a rule of the Ohio Society, that we have no blanks among the speakers. (Applause.)

“The first toast of the evening is ‘The President of the United States.’ (Great applause. Band played the ‘Star Spangled Banner.’) You will please fill your glasses, and all, while standing, drink now to the health of our President.” (All stand and drink to the health of the President. Band plays “My Country ’Tis of Thee.”)

“No body of men know how to do honor to the President better than do the men from Ohio, for have we not given this country six presidents in the past, and the Lord and Senator Hanna only know how many more we will give in the future. (Great applause and laughter.) The gentlemen who will respond to this toast is the first member of the President’s cabinet, the secretary of state, and, by the way, he is also an honorary member of this Society. We know the modesty of this great man, and when first securing him as our special guest of the evening, I had to promise that he should not be called upon to make any speech; but with many years of exceptionally useful service behind him, and never having been known to flinch from a duty thrust upon him, he afterwards consented to respond to this toast, and it is with delight and great satisfaction, fellow members of this Society, that I now have the honor to present to you the Honorable John Hay, the secretary of state, who will respond to the toast, ‘The president of the United States.’” (Tremendous applause.)

After the applause ceased, Colonel Hay said: “Ladies, Your Excellencies, Fellow Citizens: A very eminent American and one of the wittiest of men leaped some time ago into quite unmerited fame by saying, ‘Some men are born great; others are born in Ohio.’ (Laughter.) This is mere tautology, because a man who is born in Ohio is born great. I can say that, as the rest of you cannot, without any imputation of egotism, for I have labored all my life under the serious handicap of not having been born in this fortunate state. Indeed, when I look back on the shifting scenes of my life, although I am not that altogether deplorable creature a man without a country, yet from the point of view of pull and prestige I am almost equally bereft, for I am a man without a state. I was born in Indiana. I grew up in Illinois. I was educated in Rhode Island, and it is not the fault of that scholarly community that I know so little. I learned my law in Springfield and my politics in Washington and my diplomacy at the hands—always friendly, but not too indulgent—of these masters of the art whom we have with us to-night. (Applause.) I have a farm in New Hampshire and desk room in the District of Columbia.

“When I look at the sources from which my blood descends, the first ancestors of whom I ever heard were a Scotchman who was half English and a German woman who was half French. (Laughter.) Of my immediate progenitors my mother was from New England and my father from the South. Now in all this bewilderment of origin and experience I can only put on an aspect of deep humility in any gathering of favorite sons and confess that I am only an American. (Applause and cries of 'Good.')

But after all, the place where a man happened to be born is no justification of personal boasting. I never knew a man who chose his own birthplace, but the man is indeed fortunate who chooses the right place to be married in. This Mr. Hoyt and I did, and I have no doubt it is owing to this lucky chance—for lucky chances are gregarious, they like to flock together—that he and I enjoy to-night the greatest honor of both our lives—that he is your president and that I am your guest. But that you may not regard me as altogether destitute of respectable antecedents I did live for some years in Ohio, and was very happy there, and when in obedience to what seemed an imperative duty, I went to Washington, some twenty years ago, I might have been pardoned for not recognizing the fact that I had left Ohio, for every department of the national power and activity was then in the hands of a citizen of that imperial state. The President was an Ohio man, equally distinguished in character and achievement. The finances were in the strong and capable hands of John Sherman. The army gladly obeyed the orders of Tecumseh Sherman, with Phil Sheridan as second in command, while at the head of that august body, the Supreme Court, sat Chief Justice Waite. The executive, the purse, the sword and the scales of justice, all in the hands of functionaries from the state which knows naturally how to breed men who make war and make money and make laws, and as I ought before I sit down to make some reference at least to the subject of the toast to which I am supposed to be responding, where is there a more glorious roll call of names than in the Presidents from Ohio? The two Harrisons—old and young 'Tippecanoe'; Grant, one of those simple great men for whom history has so sure a partiality; Hayes, the ideal Republican citizen; and those two twins in fate and fame, so alike in destiny and so different in methods and in temperament—Garfield and McKinley. (Great applause.) All of them Ohio men by birth or adoption, all of them equally illustrious in peace and in war—soldiers and citizens without reproach.

“But I imagine that the especial subject of the toast assigned to me this evening is that of our actual President, the young, gallant, able, brilliant President Roosevelt. (Great applause.) I am glad to be able to say a word about him in his absence which few men would be hardy enough to say to his face, for like all men of high courage and manliness, he is not hospitable to flattery. In the long roll of our Presidents, all of them men of mark (looking at Senator Hanna; great applause and laughter), I see you have come spontaneously to the conclusion that long and great as the list of our Presidents is, it is still open to indefinite expansion. They are all men of lofty character and lofty ideals, not a name among them smirched by the slightest stain of corruption or wrongdoing, all of them showing to the world clean hands and high aims. President Roosevelt holds and will always hold a distinguished place. The most famous of German poets has said that talent is formed in the solitudes, character in the torrent of the world. Our President has had the advantage of both these environments. From the cloistered life of an American college boy, sheltered from the ruder currents of the world by the ramparts of wealth and of gentle nurture, he passed still very young into the wide expanse of the hills and plains. In that environment a man grows to his full stature if the original stuff is good. He came back to the East bringing with him, as Tennyson sang, 'The wrestling thews that throw the world.' From that time his career has been onward and upward, for that is the law of his being. He does not disdain the garland of fame, but his greatest enjoyment is in grasping the tools that fit his hand. His ideal of public work is that set forth by the greatest teacher and ruler that ever lived—'Whosoever will be chief among you let him be your servant.' It is no distinction to an American President to be honest, nor to be brave, nor to be intelligent, nor to be patriotic—they have all been all of these; all these attributes are postulates of the position; but the country is indeed to be congratulated when all of these high qualities are heightened and tinged by that ineffable light which for want of a more descriptive term we call genius. It is this which makes honesty a scorching flame to fraud and corruption, which makes courage and inspiration in battle or in council, which raises intelligence to the lightning flash of intuition and patriotism to a religious fervor of consecration, and it is this which makes Theodore Roosevelt the man and the President he is. (Applause.)

"And finally I, whose memories are of a generation of which few survivors remain, feel like congratulating you, who are young, in the words of the dying Voltaire on the eve of the splendors and the marvels of the French revolution, which he was not to witness: 'You young men are fortunate, you will see fine things.'

"In the six years that remain of President Roosevelt's term—if my arithmetic is faulty it is subject to correction—you will see what a stout heart and active mind, a vital intelligence, that wide experience of the world, a passion for truth and justice, and a devoted patriotism can accomplish at the head of a nation which unites the strength of a mighty youth to the political sense which is the priceless inheritance of centuries of free government. (Great applause.)

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart for this kind reception. I thank our distinguished guests for the honor they have done us in being with us to-night, and I will delay you no longer from the real enjoyments of the evening." (Tremendous applause.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Mr. Hoyt then said: "We are favored in having gathered around our board to-night the representatives of seven great nations, and I propose now that you all fill your glasses and rise again and drink to the health of their august and imperial sovereigns and their two presidents."

(All rise and drink to this toast.)

"We welcome most cordially to-night the ambassador from Russia (applause), representing his imperial majesty the Czar of all the Russians. We welcome also the ambassador from the Republic of Mexico (applause), that friendly republic on our southwest border. We welcome also the ambassador from Italy (applause), representing his majesty the King of Italy (applause), and we welcome the ambassador from Great Britain (applause and cheers), representing his majesty the King of Great Britain and Emperor of all the Indies. (Applause.) We are also most glad to welcome the chargé d'affaires of the French embassy (great applause), representing the great French Republic (applause), and only regret that his chief, the ambassador, could not be with us to-night, owing to the fact that he has not yet reached our friendly shores. We welcome also the chargé d'affaires of the German embassy, and we had hoped until the last moment that his excellency the ambassador of Germany might be with us, and we deeply regret that, owing to illness, he is prevented from being with us to-night.

"The next and second toast on our programme, members of the——" (Senator Depew calls Mr. Hoyt's attention to the fact that he has omitted to welcome the ambassador from Austro-Hungary.) "I beg ten thousand pardons. I don't know why it is, but unfortunately I am blind in my left eye, and I have been from my youth up, and I owe ten thousand apologies for not welcoming most cordially the ambassador from Austro-Hungary (tremendous applause and cheers), representing his imperial majesty the Emperor of Austro-Hungary. (Great applause.)

"The second toast on our programme is 'The Sovereigns and Chiefs of State Represented by Our Distinguished Guests.' This will be responded to by his excellency the ambassador from Russia, and whom I can assure from the members of this Society and all the guests present will receive a warm and most cordial welcome in whatever language he may see fit to address us. Members of the Ohio Society of New York and our guests, it is my honor now to introduce to you his excellency Count Cassini, the Russian ambassador, who will now respond to his toast."

Count Cassini said: "In the absence of the dean of the diplomatic corps, Herr von Holleben, there devolves upon me, by right of seniority, the duty and the pleasure of responding to the toast which you are here to propose to the health of the august sovereigns and the chiefs of state represented at this hospitable table.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“The eagerness with which my colleagues and I have come to this banquet in honor of Secretary of State Hay evidences better than all that I might be able to say the high esteem in which we hold the eminent statesman who directs with an enlightened patriotism, tact, and a remarkable ability, and with that exquisite courtesy which never offends, the diplomatic relations between this grand country and the powers of the entire world. In thanking you for your gracious invitation which permits us to pass these charming hours with you and to render sympathetic homage and esteem to one of the most distinguished of your fellow citizens, I ask you, gentlemen, in the name of my colleagues and on my own behalf, to rise and drain our cups to the health and the prosperity of the secretary of state, the Hon. John Hay.” (Great applause.)

(All rise and drink to the health of Secretary Hay.)

Toastmaster Hoyt then said: “The next toast of the evening is ‘The Secretary of State.’ Thirty-eight men have filled that high office, from Thomas Jefferson, the first, down to the gentleman who sits at my right this evening, and three of those thirty-eight men have come from the state of Ohio (laughter), and I am sure that I but voice the sentiment of every gentleman here tonight when I say that of all the thirty-eight men who have filled this great office none have filled it with more honor or with greater ability than the Honorable John Hay (tremendous applause and cheers), who, though born in Indiana, spent several years in Ohio, and like many other wise men found his better half in that state. The gentleman who is to respond to this toast is known to quite a number of you. More than a quarter of a century ago, when living in Cleveland, one summer’s night, I drove out to a town hall in one of the suburbs of that city to hear two young men make each a political speech. Those two young men were the present secretary of state and the gentleman who is to respond to this toast, and ever since that night, more than twenty-five years ago, he has made many speeches, and is still making them. Further remark from me being entirely unnecessary, I take great pleasure in introducing to you now the Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Ohio, who will respond to the toast, ‘The Secretary of State.’” (Applause.)

Mr. Hoyt said: “Mr. Toastmaster, Your Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, and Fellow Members of the Ohio Society: Your worthy, though somewhat automobilistic, toastmaster has failed to disclose in his opening remarks one peculiar distinction enjoyed by this Society. Owing to my propinquity to him—and the definition of that word is broad enough to indicate that I am his brother (laughter), of course it goes without saying it is apparent that I am his younger brother and also that I am within easy throwing distance of him, and under these circumstances it might be more cautious, if not more prudent, for me to follow his example and to remain silent on a subject of considerable delicacy; but, ladies and gentlemen, how can I do this? How can I forbear?”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

My pulses are swelled by a feeling of family pride akin to that which mantled the brow and flushed the cheek of the small boy who effectually silenced the vauntings of a playmate who was boasting that his father had lately been elected to Congress. 'Pooh, that's nothing; my dad is out on bail.' So at the risk of being presumptuous let me tell you for a moment what your president, but my brother, has done for you. This is the only Society that I know anything about the chief executive officer of which is possessed of an inappropriate cream-colored devil of a machine by which he is transported from his country place to his office, a distance of something like thirty-five miles, if I am correctly informed, in less than an hour, while the speed of the machine at no time exceeds the legal limit of twenty miles. (Great laughter and applause.) The fact that the Long Island magistrate found to the contrary is a mere incident; it is evidence rather of the slowness of his mental processes than an evidence of the speed of the machine.

"I was very greatly encouraged and reassured at learning from the toast-master to-night how large a cash balance you have in the bank, because feeling sure of your generosity, as I am of that of all Ohioans, I know that you will spend it all rather than to permit your president and my brother to languish in the ill-ventilated and vermin-infested jails of Long Island. (Great laughter and applause.)

"A close searcher after truth has lately remarked that the Scriptural reference to the roaring lion going up and down the earth seeking whom he may devour is not mere hyperbole or persiflage more or less airy; it is in fact a truth—downright prophecy, and that prophecy has been fulfilled and the eternal verity of the Scriptures triumphantly vindicated by the definition of your president's graceless automobile.

"Now, it is proper, and for two reasons, ladies and gentlemen, that the Ohio Society should pay our secretary of state the striking compliment of this dinner—I say our secretary because the members of the Society are all patriotic Americans, and by reason of his glorious achievements, Secretary John Hay has become ours in a very real sense. Neither his family, his close friends, nor he himself even, can lay claim to any monopoly of his fame. What he has done he has done not only for his country, but for mankind, and because he is an American all of us Americans partake somewhat of his shining and imperishable renown. We are all illumined by the lustre of it.

"I have said that this testimonial in his honor is proper for two reasons. In the first place it is fitting we should pay him unique honor, and in returning to him our heartfelt thanks for what he has accomplished, as I have said, not only for the republic, but for mankind, I am sure I voice the sentiments of all of you when I say we are simply giving to the secretary what is justly his due and no more. We are but obeying the divine injunction to 'Render unto

Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's,' for the enthusiastic commendation not only of his own countrymen, but all good people the world over, is his by right, by the highest and most dominant right, by the right of glorious and successful achievements. He has compelled our praise; he does not ask for it. (Applause.)

“But again, secondly, if it had not been for Ohio the secretary of state could not have accomplished what he has accomplished. I will prove that if you will bear with me for a moment. When Mr. Hayes made him his first assistant secretary of state, and another and lamented one made him secretary, as has been said by the toastmaster, he found his wife in Ohio, and I am sure even on so public an occasion as this I may be pardoned for respectfully and reverently noting how inspiring and constant assistance has been rendered to her distinguished husband by that daughter of the Buckeye state. (Applause.) I have got to contradict the secretary for a moment. He said that a man was wise who chose his wife in Ohio—and that is true; but he objected on the occasion of my wedding to my choosing a wife at all, because I remember when he came up to shake hands with me he said, ‘Why are you getting married? You have no right to do it. Marriage is a right of Hymen, and you are a short man.’ (Applause.)

“We citizens of Ohio, especially those of the northern part of the state, are responsible in no small measure for furnishing the secretary with an essential preparation for his momentous work. It was while he lived amongst us, on the borders of the great lakes and on the bank of the crooked river, that he acquired his skill in negotiations from several astute Cleveland gentlemen, whom I see present here, and that he learned the invaluable lessons in tact and diplomacy from the then Mister, but now Senator, Hanna, and that he caught the inspiration of a graceful and enduring modesty from one who shall be nameless. (Laughter and applause.)

“It has been sometimes said, and quite generally believed, I fear, that the term ‘American Diplomacy’ is a misnomer. In our relations with other nations we are said to be rather blunt than tactful; aggressively aggressive sometimes instead of persuasive; and candid often instead of diplomatic. A story which I have lately heard, and which perhaps you have not heard at all: Some little time ago a dinner was given, a diplomatic dinner, in Europe, at which the representatives of all the great powers were present. The ambassador from Great Britain was lamenting to the ambassador from France that on the occasion of his last visit to Paris he had failed to purchase some very rare and beautiful pieces of tapestry that were offered for sale at a marvelously small price, and had thus lost an opportunity to acquire these valuable objects of art for a comparatively small outlay. The commercial side of the transaction appealed to the American minister. It awakened his interest and erected his ears, as the Greeks used to say, so he leaned over and said: ‘Excellency, no use crying over spilled milk; we have all lost lots of chances to make bargains in our lifetime. After the Chicago fire I could have bought the whole windy city for a pair of rubber boots.' 'And why didn't you make the purchase?' suavely asked the French ambassador. 'Why did I not make the purchase,' said the American diplomat. 'Hell, I didn't have the boots.'

"No such criticism, my friends, can be made of American diplomacy while Col. John Hay stands forth as the chief exponent of it. He not only discharges the duties of his high office, but he adorns them. (Applause.) I am sure that I can say without wounding the sensibilities of any of our guests here that our secretary of state, the poet, the scholar, historian, the virile but exquisite and graceful and tasteful orator, the trained diplomat, and, above all, the wise, discriminating, but just, statesman, is the peer of any minister for foreign affairs now living. (Great applause and cheers.) It is true, of course, that we Americans are an aggressive people and like push and dash and courage and pluck, but after all there is a strong strain of conservatism in us. Paradoxical as it may appear, it is nevertheless true that he who would lead the sober second judgment of the American people must also follow it. The trouble with us over here, my friends, is that we are interfered with too much. We are lectured too much, and legislated for too much, alas! If you search through the three imposing volumes of Bates' Annotated Statutes of the State of Ohio, you will find but one provision in the law which stands out preëminently as a piece of humane and eminently beneficial legislation. Of course you know the section to which I refer. It is that one which prescribes that the legislature of the state shall hold biennial instead of annual sessions. How the general assembly of Ohio were ever induced to adopt that law is a mystery to me. Oh, if the legislatures of all the states, and if even Congress itself, after making adequate appropriations for say ten or even fifty years, would then adjourn sine die, we would have a period of solid prosperity in this country, my friends (applause), compared with which the enormous strides we have made forward in the last few years would be but as pigmy steps—and the steps of a lame pigmy at that. I can see from the anxious look on Senator Hanna's face that he fears that any such plan as this would prevent his re-election to the senate of the United States. He need not be alarmed; no successor to him could be created. His right to hold over would be indisputable. Nobody could oust him—well, nobody can oust him now for that matter. What I am coming to and may later on get to say was this, that way down in our hearts we Americans admire and love a safe man. When one of our public servants has gained our absolute confidence in his wise discretion, he always becomes deservedly great in our estimation. It was because of his possession of that indomitable quality of discretion, because of his admirable poise, that the lamented McKinley will always stand in history by the side of the calm and majestic Washington, by the side of the sagacious and patient Lincoln. It was because the guest of the evening possessed that quality in large measure that the illustrious McKinley selected him as prime minister and that the present honored President of the United States retains him as such. While John Hay remains at the head of our state department we Americans can sleep nights. We feel perfectly sure that under his administration of foreign affairs no encroachment upon the rights, no impairment of the dignity and the majesty of the Republic, will be for a moment tolerated; but we feel equally sure that no unwarranted and unfair claims on the part of the Republic will ever be put forward or made. We know that in every juncture he will hold the Stars and Stripes aloft with a firm unshaking hand, with a courage unflinching and indomitable; but we know also, and we are thankful to-night, that he will never lower the dignity of that majestic emblem by needlessly flaunting it in the face of the world. (Applause.)

“But I must not in his presence dwell too much—and I am already taking up more time than I should—I must not in his presence dwell too much upon the diplomatic triumphs of our secretary. If I did I might be stirred by the glories, and the fear that I might unwittingly say something which he himself would wish I had not said—constrains me. I know if I wound the sensibilities of any of our guests here I would most grievously wound the secretary himself. But this I can say, and I am justified in saying, that under his wise administration of foreign affairs, while the prestige of the United States has been greatly enhanced, the prestige of no other nation has been unduly diminished. When he opened with diplomatic key the closed doors of China and made them open doors, those portals were flung wide not to admit American capital and American products alone—when they were opened they disclosed the promised land to all the nations of the earth and all are permitted on fair and equal terms to enter there. After the Boxer outbreak the action of the United States under his leadership has always stood on the side of a great forbearance and a large magnanimity. The treaty which supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has made the isthmian canal possible without a jar of trouble or a breach of faith. That canal will undoubtedly promote the interests of this country, but it will also grant large opportunities to all the rest of the world.

“His services in favor of the Hague tribunal, making war less probable and peace more possible, were made not for us alone, but unselfishly for all mankind. The eloquent appeal which he made on behalf of the downtrodden of Roumania voiced not only the sentiments of his own countrymen, but the sentiments of the enlightened civilized world, and in the present juncture of affairs, happily no longer critical, we, his countrymen, are serenely confident that the Monroe Doctrine on which the Republic for years has stood, and will forever stand, will be maintained inviolate; but we are also as serenely confident that that doctrine will not be unwarrantably or unduly extended by our secretary of state, as his mission first of all has been to discover the just thing, and when he has found that he has done it courageously and unflinchingly. I have said that his late chief, the lamented McKinley, has joined the great triumvirate of American Presidents, for Washington and Lincoln and McKinley will always stand together in one immortal group, and so I may well say of the guest of the evening that when, may the day be far distant, he exchanges his bright laurel wreath for the imperishable crown which God Himself places upon the brows of those who have unselfishly labored for mankind, he himself will join a great American triumvirate, a triumvirate of American secretaries of state, for Webster and Seward and Hay will always stand together in Columbia's Temple of Fame. The fame of our secretary, ladies and gentlemen, stands upon justice, for its broad foundation stone, and as his illustrious predecessor, Mr. Webster has well said: 'Justice, sir, is the greatest interest of man on earth.'

"Now, one word more and I am done. You all know the famous statement which one great Englishman made of another. The first was famous as an orator and an author and the other one of the foremost of Great Britain's secretaries of state for foreign affairs. At a time when all Englishmen were fearful, the great minister alone was undaunted. At a time when veniality was too common he was conspicuous for his incorruptibility, and so his wise but gentle and discriminating countryman said of him—and well said of him—'the secretary stood alone. Modern degeneracy did not reach him.' Such a statement as that, my friends, can never be correctly or appropriately said of Secretary Hay, for while it is undoubtedly true that degeneracy, whether ancient or modern, has never reached him, and will never reach him, he does not stand alone, for eighty million of his enthusiastic, approving and grateful countrymen stand with him upon the place he will claim." (Great applause.)

Mr. Colgate Hoyt then said: "I understand now why, when the gentleman who last spoke, in reading his speech to me a day or two ago, turned over the first two or three pages, he said, 'That is only a preamble and prelude and introduction and I won't bother you to read that to you.' He reminds me of a story of two Germans. One was trying to get another to sign a very important contract, and he brought it to him and he said, 'Now, mein frent, dis iss a contract, und I am going to read it to you voord for voord, but der first two pages iss the preamble und dat I will leave out, und I vill dell you vy, because I may vant to change it.' (Laughter.) This same speaker has also stated that he was the younger brother of your president with an emphasis on the younger. I want to say that his figures and facts with regard to automobiling are very far from correct; but he has youth in his favor, and I believe he will yet be running an automobile himself. Why, only a few years ago, with several horses in his stable, he would only drive one horse at a time, and now when he gets on his native soil in Ohio he is not satisfied with less than four, and he has a relay of four at that, and I expect very soon to hear that he has got not only the automobile fever, but is going it with two abreast.

“The next toast on the programme is, ‘The State of Ohio,’ the state we all love so much. The souvenir which you have received to-night, the plate with the picture of our special guest, Mr. Secretary Hay, on it, was manufactured by an Ohio firm. The buckeyes which the reception committee are wearing on the lapels of their coats to-night were gathered from the front lawn, Mansfield, Ohio, of that great statesman and once secretary of state, John Sherman. Why, fellow-members of this Society, the state is big enough and it is square enough for almost any speaker, and I know of no one who can better respond to that toast than that sturdy son of Ohio, most successful in business, pre-eminent in politics, and while not ignoring the value of capital, is still the staunch friend of labor, the Honorable Marcus A. Hanna (great applause and cheers), of Ohio, and who needs no introduction here.” (Great applause.)

Senator Marcus A. Hanna then said: “Mr. Toastmaster, Your Excellencies, Members of the New York Ohio Society, and Ladies: I can tell you no new story about Ohio. The fact is, I have but very little to tell after those who have preceded me, and yet it is fitting on this occasion to pay tribute to our state in this the anniversary year of her centennial existence. A hundred years old! Dear old mother, how we love you! Bright star in the galaxy of states, we look heavenward when we contemplate you! Sons of Ohio by birthright, men of New York by adoption, I bring greeting to you from the boys at home and wish you all a Happy New Year. (Applause.) We have been busy since you left us. The grand old state has kept pace in the march of progress and to-day we are proud of her position and influence. May I quote a few figures to show what we have done while you have been making money in New York? Our population in 1800 was 45,365; in 1900, 4,157,545. We have grown some, our cities have grown and developed. In 1802 they were enumerated by Marietta, Chillicothe and Cincinnati, with a population of 1,000 each. In 1902 seventy-one cities over five thousand and the largest 381,000—Cleveland, Ohio. Our manufacturing industries employ 345,809 men, our wages $153,935,330. The number of employees in our coal-mining interests 24,901, producing 20,321,290 tons, value $33,000,000. Our railroads 8,791 miles, employees 67,834, wages paid $42,334,484—I won’t read the gross income owing to the present condition. (Laughter.) Blessed as Ohio is by nature, with fertile soil and a diversity of climate, peopled by a race of men who came from all quarters of the East, and when we remember that that emigration came—started toward the West under the inspiration of the Ordinance of 1787, when the Northwest Territory was put upon the calendar as forever opposed to slavery in any form, the inspiration called forth that character of men calculated to make any country great, and it was unique that that emigration started along parallel lines from the South, in the South from the Carolinas and Virginia, in the Middle from Pennsylvania and on the North from New England, going West, keeping to the parallels and establishing zones of population, characteristic and distinct. Those hardy pioneers hewed their way through the great forests of Ohio, and when in after years the population became greater the lines merged and the zones came together and the intermingling of the blood of those almost distinct classes produced a race of men and a people whose natural result was, as it has become, a great state and a great people. (Applause.)

“ We like to speak of our state as having for fifty years held the third place in the Union. The reason we do not hold it now is because, appreciating the importance of a higher civilization in the West, we sent our people westward to build up states like ours. The mud was so deep in Illinois that most of them stuck there (laughter), and therefore Illinois got the start of us. I don't want to rob the old state of Virginia of her prerogative, known so long as the 'Mother of Presidents,' but having surrendered that prerogative and it having drifted west, we in Ohio, undertaking to supply the demand, which became so great that we adopted that modern method and have become the incubator of Presidents. (Laughter.) The industry still thrives.

“ I don't know how to better express my appreciation of these happy gatherings of the sons from my native state, with their guests, than to apply to you the well-known motto that in union there is strength. It is a characteristic of Ohio men to stand together whenever important events or necessities arise to need hearty co-operation. Although large in membership as a Society, small in numbers with regard to the population of this great metropolitan city, but the character of Ohio will leaven even a larger lot; we congratulate New York that this Society is growing and that there is such a large element from the Buckeye state among you.

“ This subject of Ohio, so often repeated and worn almost threadbare, finds little interest to an Ohio Society only in this wonderful productiveness of our state, combining so many elements of prosperity, so co-operative in all its industries, so rich in soil and mineral deposits, gives us the opportunity for a larger diversity of interest than any other state in the Union; we farm, we mine and we manufacture, and we support our population. We are prosperous because we are industrious, we are happy because we are peaceful. (There's a good many Quakers among us.) We have always responded to the call of our country in her emergencies; we have always rallied to the support of all the people our full quota for all such emergencies, and we believe that we have the right to be proud of the record of the past, and I might say, my friends, that although in this souvenir which has been presented to us our reputation is not worldwide, because in examining that beautiful plate which will perpetuate the honor and glory of our secretary, if you do not break it (laughter), one of my distinguished friends of the diplomatic corps, and I do not mention names, after gazing in rapture upon the face and the ornaments, asked if those nuts were chestnuts. (Laughter.) I bring that in just now because I don't want to be styled as a chestnut, and in closing may I note the absence of one who has frequently been your honored guest, who has been torn from us by the ruthless hand of a dastardly assassin. Did it need that sacrifice to emphasize the character of that man, a type, the highest type not only of a citizen and son of Ohio, but of America? Did it need that to bring, to refresh our memories, and to typify and idealize the character that I portray? Did it need all this to bring to us a realization of that type of American manhood, an example which will stand ever before us in colors bright? Then, indeed, Thy will, not ours, be done." (Great applause.)

Mr. Hoyt said: "The last toast of the evening is 'The State of New York,' the adopted state of so many of us, and what shall I say of the gentleman who is to respond to this toast? Surely I can say what another said a year ago of the senator from Ohio. He is IT, for if ever a man in the Empire state of New York was It, it is the Honorable Chauncey M. Depew, a man who receives more invitations to banquets in one year than most other men in their entire lives, a man whose kindly heart and bubbling wit cheers, and whose graceful but forceful eloquence inspires everybody. A man who has responded probably to more toasts than any other man in this United States and yet under such circumstances has never disappointed an audience. It is with supreme satisfaction, therefore, that I now have the honor of introducing to you the senator from New York, the Honorable Chauncey M. Depew, who will respond to this, our last toast of the evening." (Applause.)

Hon. Chauncey M. Depew said: "Mr. Chairman, Your Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen: I feel after what has been said by the secretary of state, that after twenty years of indignation I am forgiven for having said that some men are born great and some in Ohio.

"I discover that the Buckeye still lives and that he makes everybody pay tribute to his greatness. It was only after the secretary of state had made that little slip which expressed his convictions, that I knew that he thought that Hanna had created all the Presidents of the United States. It is an extraordinary event that calls us here to-night. We are not only honoring Ohio and the secretary of state, but all the great powers of the world are present here to celebrate Ohio. After to-night the various distinguished diplomats will say in writing to their august sovereigns or to their chancelleries: 'You make a mistake in giving our credentials to Washington; you should have sent them to Ohio.' You have not recognized the imperium in imperio; and then the humiliation of my position. Not only does Ohio stand here to-night the one state which makes august Presidents, the one state that commands all the great nations of which we have just become a family to be here, but they hold that celebration in New York, and the hospitalities of the occasion prevent me from expressing my feelings. I was glad to hear the brother brag of the improvement in the legislative methods of Ohio by which they escaped the dangers of having the elect of her people made to do what the people wanted, because it was only once in two years; but the Ohio method of meeting that reform is that the legislature invariably takes a recess until the next year and so they have a legislature every year. (Laughter.)

“As a student of our country I have noticed that we develop by our environment and our education. That environment and that education is local, for we are in our several states in their peculiarities the most provincial people. It is not the school that educates the citizen, nor the academy, nor the university; it is the country store, where every night, and every Saturday night especially, public affairs are discussed. It is beyond all controversy that the best club in the United States is the gathering under the horse-shed of the members of the congregation of the country church between the morning and evening services, when all questions, local, state and national, are discussed and decided. Now, traveling around the country as I do, and stopping everywhere, I attend these congresses which create public opinion. Outside of my own state they have not materialized particularly yet, but I am cultivating Hanna. You will notice, as I have noticed, that in New York, wherever you may go, the discussion is, at the country store, or under the horse-shed on Sunday, about stocks, the influences of legislation, or the foreign markets of the world, or what-not, upon the different markets in which securities are sold and bought. As you go West you will find in the mountain states it is mines, gold and silver—prospects of keeping those which are good for something, of selling in New York those that are good for nothing, and of finding others. As you get on the slope of the Sierra, and come down toward the Pacific ocean, you will find they everywhere say what is said they say in another place: ‘What we would be if we only had water.’ When you get to New Jersey you discover that the one subject everwhere is how the state taxes are paid and the local taxes are relieved by making that commonwealth the hospitable home of the trust. But when you come to Ohio, the sole subject, whether it be in the school-house or the kindergarten, whether it be in the academy or the university, whether it be at the country store or the cross-road, or the church or the prayer-meeting, the discussion is politics (laughter), practical politics, theoretical politics. It is thus that this great state, now grown to four millions of people, has created four millions of politicians (laughter and applause), and what chance is there for the rest of us who are attending to the ordinary duties of taking care of our families and supporting the country?

“Not only have they outstripped us in securing offices by this pursuit of office and the means to secure it, but now has come in for several generations heredity, and so they breed politicians.

“ Darwin advances the theory that if you mate a fantail pigeon with a fantail pigeon and continue that thing indefinitely, there would be more fantails and more fantails, until as a final result the pigeon would be nothing but a fantail. Gentlemen, there you are.

“ Just after the recent election I was hurrying along Broadway, when a dignified and impressive gentleman stopped me and said, ‘ Senator, a moment. Are you satisfied with the result?’ ‘ Perfectly, perfectly.’ ‘ But didn’t the remarkable slump in New York discourage you?’ ‘ No, because we carried the state.’ ‘ Then, notwithstanding your disappointments here, because the country is safe, you are content?’ ‘ Absolutely.’ ‘ Would you mind, then, loaning me half a dollar?’ That gentleman was a New Yorker. He mingled with the discussion of great questions, finance.

“ A gentleman present here to-night went from Maine and after winning distinguished success in every line for twenty-five years in the world, returned to his native place and at night went down to the country store, listened to the congress that had struck him with awe in his youth—apparently the same men; told them who he was. One of the old leaders said, ‘ Is it true that you are getting $10,000 a year?’ My friend was getting many times that. He said, ‘ It is true.’ ‘ Then,’ said the leader, ‘ that shows what cheek and circumstances will do for a man.’ That was the New England youth, who discusses nothing but what has become of the man who was glad he was born in New England but had the sense to live somewhere else.

“ Now, one cannot contemplate Ohio, what has been said of her to-night, without wondering at the success of American public life. We have no education in this country for great offices of state, of executive, or of diplomacy. In every other country of the world there are classes, except France of to-day, classes who are hereditary legislators, who are taken for public life, and who have the heredity of government. That is particularly the case in Great Britain, where not only the older sons, but the younger sons, unless they have gone to distant colonies, to build up their country in those distant places, are to be found in the house of commons, in the departments, or in the public life of Great Britain. But we have no heredity, no schools, no education for government, and yet our young men go to the legislature, they go to the house of representatives, they go to the senate, they go to the cabinet, they become Presidents, become diplomats abroad—I ask you to look over the hundred years of our existence as a nation, to compare our executives, our cabinet ministers, our diplomats, our legislators, with those of other countries where this education is complete, and I think that we will have no occasion to be other than proud of the men who have come from the workshop, from the farm, from the professions all over the country, and have been equal to the best of diplomacies and diplomacies in foreign countries, and to the best of legislators, executives and cabinet ministers in their own. John Jay, who had never been in diplomacy, negotiated that first treaty, which is still the foundation of our relations with Great Britain, and as you go down the list we have the Adamses, and we have Jefferson, and we have Daniel Webster, and we have Clay, and we have Seward, and we have Lincoln, and we have Garfield, and we have McKinley, and I think in view of what we are gathered here to-night to express and to worthily compliment, that in that great cabinet stands equally John Hay. (Great applause.) It is the American growth of American expression, not of education for public life—an editor, a man of letters, a traveler from journalism to literature, and successively from literature to the chancelleries of our government abroad and successively in the secretary of state, first as assistant—and successfully, to find at last his proper place when he becomes the head of our foreign affairs.

“Mark Hanna, whose judgment is accurate and perfect on men in the places which they should occupy, said to me ten years ago: ‘There is one man and one place that I intend to work for and only one, and that is John Hay as secretary for state.’

“But of all the triumphs of our guests of to-night, the one which we honor him most for is what he has done for arbitration. Arbitration is the greatest force in the world to-day. In the old days, and until this year almost, nations could diplomatize, and if they failed they could resort to what Sherman said was ‘hell’—and that was war, which decided nothing except that might won. In the older days all individual disputes were settled on the theory that God would protect the right, but the Almighty held off and might and skill won, and from that evolved the law from which we have justice and protection for the weaker. The great forces in our country to-day—new forces, but gigantic and mighty forces, are Capital and Labor. So long as they are harmonious we have peace and prosperity. When they are at war society is disintegrated, industries are paralyzed and if it proceeded far enough we would have anarchy. It seems to me that the only solution of our difficulties, national as well as in our own domestic affairs, is that for which our secretary has stood, and that is arbitration. These great forces of Capital and Labor now settle their differences by strikes and by lock-outs. It is a return to the old mediæval method of endurance, of courage and of strength. It is barbarous. The mediæval warrior litigant could do it—it harmed no one but himself or his friends; but when associations upon which we all depend for our safety and our comfort are assailed, we are all interested. The Civic Association, happily gotten up and happily led by our friend, Senator Hanna, is doing a good work, but if the church, politicians, everybody, should move to have such processes adopted,

then hereafter there could be no strikes because the genius of the American people, when once these things are understood, is equal to devising the means, and when the means are devised by which such questions can be settled without creating such a cataclysm as we have had recently, public opinion will compel obedience to the judgment which has once been arrived at for these solutions. (Cries of ' Good,' and great applause.)

“ Now, I think I can claim for New York, notwithstanding the claim which is made abroad, because we all claim good things, and I mean no disrespect to the representative of the august Czar, our distinguished representative from Russia, who has so gracefully and so admirably complimented our guest and pleased us here to-night in all languages, but when the Venezuela trouble arose in Cleveland's administration I had the honor to deliver an oration before the New York State Bar Association. The acute question then was how to avert war and whether war was necessary. I took the position of an international court of arbitration. Our New York State Bar Association, our court of appeals, and all our judicial bodies in this state, formulated a plan for an international court of arbitration. They called a national congress at Washington in order to put that into effect. It amounted to just this, that if right itself it would ultimately crystallize into good works and that good results would develop in the course of years; but we have gone along, we have finally got, on the initiative of the Czar of Russia, we did finally get, a tribunal at the Hague. Unless called by a great European power like the Czar, that tribunal would never have met. Having met, it formulated the processes by which a court was established, and then that court seemed to disappear; it seemed to go into oblivion, and it would have died of innocuous desuetude, but there came up this other question of the great nations of Great Britain and Germany to appeal to that court. Instantly that court had dignity, had power, had position, and it had that place which by a court once gained is never lost again. I think that we can say that in the processes by which that happy result which creates this court and makes it forever a tribunal of peace, forever a tribunal where public opinion will order contending nations to come—not to the battlefield, but to justice, that the fact that he did more than any other to bring about that happy result to pass, declared his position among the diplomats who are around about him here to-night—our honored guest of the evening, the United States secretary of foreign affairs (cheers and cries of ' Good ')—and I want to say that when the verdict comes to be written there will be an abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, there will be by happy and successful diplomacy the removal of those obligations, obligations most dangerous, between Great Britain and the United States, which ought to be entirely removed between these two great countries, and there will be those negotiations which make possible that inter-oceanic canal, the dream of our nation for fifty years, and all of them will be legions upon the shield of our secretary of state. 'A man without a country,' he said. A man without a country! Thank God he is our country, our countryman. He may have no state, and having this distinction which all the world recognizes it is characteristic of Ohio that she claims him before New York could get a chance at him.

"Ohio and New York. The last contribution of Ohio to the Republic of the United States and the American people was William McKinley. (Applause.) The prosperity which came with him and has continued, the placing of our credit and our currency upon an impregnable basis in harmony with the great commercial nations of the world, the conduct of a great war with a vigor and a humanity never known before, and the Republic of Cuba will remain forever his imperishable monument.

"We have for our present President a New Yorker of New Yorkers. He has no blood in his veins but that which flows from the old Dutch Colonial times of the New Amsterdam down to his own blue and strenuous vigor. He stands to-day New York's President of the United States. When the great nations gathered around little Venezuela and he marked the boundaries beyond which they could not go, he set forever the seal of victory and perpetuity upon the Monroe Doctrine. When he declined the tempting offer to become arbitrator between these great powers he pointed their way to the Hague convention. He did much, he did everything for the peace of the world, and in a recent cataclysm of industries, where not only the comfort but the safety of the people of the United States was at stake, where conditions were likely to arise—and the present situation emphasizes they might arise—where in our great centres of population we might have riots, possibly revolution, he did the one wise and courageous act which saved the situation and did most for the peace and harmony of our people in the country everywhere. Ohio has a right to be proud of McKinley and for what he did, and to revere his memory, but we of New York are proud of the President we have furnished to the United States." (Great applause.)

Mr. Hoyt then said: "Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York: The time has come to draw this seventeenth annual banquet to a close. We feel that before parting we certainly want to thank their excellencies and all our other distinguished guests for making this seventeenth annual banquet one so memorable, and with the thanks especially to the speakers who have so entertained us we will now bid you all good-night."

It involves no lack of appreciation of the work done by all the members of the Society in preparing for this banquet, and in carrying out the plans made for the same, to add a brief mention of action taken at the meeting of the Society held on the evening of February 9, 1903. Resolutions of thanks were offered and unanimously carried to Colgate Hoyt, president; Samuel H. Parsons, treasurer; A. J. C. Foyé, chairman of the house committee; and Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman of the sub-reception committee in charge of the ladies and the galleries, for their most faithful and successful labors; to William S. Hawk, proprietor of the Manhattan Hotel, for his free entertainment of the guests from Washington, and to Joseph G. Lee, secretary and treasurer of the Knowles, Taylor & Knowles Company, of East Liverpool, Ohio, for the generous care he lavished upon the preparation of the souvenir plates.

WINCHESTER FITCH, chairman of the library committee, and James H. Kennedy, historian, were invited to meet with the governing committee on February 9th, and report upon the matter committed to their hands in connection with a history of the Society. They explained that a meeting had been held and that it was the recommendation of the committee and historian that the proceedings of the Diplomatic Banquet of 1903 be published in pamphlet form, and that a similar publication be made annually. Also that steps should be taken soon for a comprehensive history of the Society. The publication of the banquet proceedings was authorized, and subsequently appeared, with those of the annual dinner of November 29, 1902, under the general title, "No. 1. Annual Publications

On February 9th President Hoyt stated that the Italian ambassador had had received notice from the other ambassadors expressing their thanks and pleasure at their entertainment at the banquet. He stated that he had also presented his thanks to the Society, his wife joining with him, and that he Ohio Society of New York. 1902-1903."

received a very cordial note from Bishop Leonard, of Ohio, accepting the position of chaplain the Society had tendered him, and expressing great pleasure at having been able to be present at the banquet. The private secretary of the Third Assistant Secretary of State, who was at the banquet, sent a letter in which he reiterated the statement that all of the guests had personally expressed to him unqualified thanks for their entertainment, and especially for the courtesy and attention shown them at the Manhattan Hotel, and also for their transportation.

At the conclusion of the business meeting, the Society was entertained by vocal and instrumental music from Messrs. Fitch, Nichols, Sadler and Drake. Also by an affecting address by a gentleman who was introduced by Merrill Watson, of the entertainment committee, as "A Long Lost Son of Ohio."

It was the story of an Ohio boy kidnapped by Asiatic brigands when a child; his father and mother, missionaries, killed; his recognition as a son of Ohio by an indelible mark upon him; his escape, his toil in reaching America, his search for even one friend of his parents. It was told simply, touchingly and in the presence of one hundred men who stood ready to give him money for the further prosecution of his search. When Mr. Watson introduced him, he recalled the murder in Asiatic Turkey of Lenz Lens, the American bicyclist who set out to ride from Constantinople to Hong Kong. Two other Americans were later sent to learn the facts of his fate.

"Those two men," said Mr. Watson, "fell in with a band of brigands. It was too late for them to retreat, and they escaped from robbery and death only because these ignorant men who had never heard of a bicycle took them for wizards with supernatural gifts.

"Among these terrible men was a small white boy who knew a few words of English and whom they were sure was of American birth. They managed to converse with him several times and finally by accident discovered a small tattooed mark upon his shoulder. A closer examination showed them that it was the seal of Ohio, undoubtedly placed there by his parents as a mute witness of his citizenship under the stars and stripes and of his Christian birth.

"They dared not lift a finger to help him or their own lives would have been in danger. But they told him as best they could of the great world from which they had come and of the friends that would aid him if he could make his escape. Then they left him and wheeled away.

"Now for a curious coincidence," Mr. Watson continued. "I was at luncheon at my club a few days ago and happened by some chance to tell this story, as one of these returned wheelmen had told it to me. A gentleman whom I knew only by sight, sitting at the next table turned to me and said: 'I beg your pardon, sir, but I was so interested that I took the liberty of listening to your tale.' 'You are welcome to your share of it,' I answered. 'May I ask you one question?' he continued. 'Certainly!' Do you know that the boy made his escape and is in this country to-day?' Then he told me a wonderful story of persistence and pluck. To make a long story short, I hunted up this boy—now a man—and he is here to-night. In his old life he was known as Gorges Stanapolis. He has taken the name of Charles Anderson, which he has discovered to be his own. I now take pleasure in introducing him and he will tell his own story."

Mr. Anderson was a dark, slim young man, with a sombre face, as of one who had known misfortune, and was not unacquainted with grief. He spoke with a decidedly foreign accent, and his story, condensed, was as follows:

"When my parents and their escorts were murdered, one little girl and myself were spared and taken captive by these brigands. In three years she died. I remembered only a few words of English. My life has been one of privation and unhappiness. If I should tell you all the things I heard and saw—the horrors and the awful cruelties—it would stagger your belief."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

He told of the visit of the wheelmen and of the inspiration and hope it gave him. He watched his chance. One day he saw a caravan afar off. At night he escaped and followed it for two days. He was taken on as a camel boy. At Cabool the caravan broke up; he worked as a coolie for a few cents a day. Then he managed to reach Calcutta, where an Englishman took him as a servant. He worked his passage on a ship to Amsterdam. Then to London, and from thence took ship to America.

"On that ship," he said impressively, "I met a steward who, when he learned my story, told me that he knew my parents; they had come across with him, when I was a boy in arms. He knew my name, and that was all he did know.

"And that is all I have ever learned. Whether my father was a missionary of some great denomination, or a zealot who went forth alone, I do not know. I have searched for some trace of my parents' family or friends, but it is all in vain. I am alone, utterly alone in this world.

"Misfortune seems to come to me in small as in great things," Mr. Anderson continued. "Only to-night as I was coming to this meeting, a man accosted me, as I stood waiting for a car. 'Do you chew?' he asked. I said I did. It was one of the old habits that hung to me.

"I handed him my plug. He said: 'Do you care where I bite this?' 'I do not.' 'Then I'll bite it on Brooklyn Bridge,' and away he walked with it.

"Last night I took a Brooklyn girl named May out to supper. I said, 'What will you have?' 'A large cold bottle and a small hot bird.' She took three birds; and I took a sandwich to even up. And as we went out, what do you think an organ grinder on the street had the cheek to play? 'How Happy are the Birds in May!'"

Well, the house was in a roar.

Mr. Anderson put on a look of extra solemnity. "Well," he said, "as you seem to be 'on' I'll drop back to American talk; as I have never been out of the United States in my life."

It was a complete sell. The professional monologist and the entertainment committee had sold every man in the house. "I was just ready," said President Hoyt afterwards, "to propose that we raise $100 to aid the young man in his search." "If a paper had been handed around before that bird story," said another member, "a pretty big sum of money could have been raised."

A half hour of story telling followed, from the "lost son of Ohio" who had been so strangely found.

James H. Kennedy suggested in the March meeting that it would be a good idea to appoint a special committee to secure the names of every eligible Ohioan in the City of New York, who might become a member if properly approached, and at the April meeting to tender a formal reception or “ smoker ” to the gentlemen on such eligible list. On motion, it was agreed that such committee be appointed, and the chair designated Charles W. Lefler, W. H. Blymyer, F. M. Applegate, the treasurer and secretary, with power to add to their number.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

When the business of the evening was concluded, a most interesting address was delivered by David Homer Bates, manager of the War Department telegraph office during the Civil War, entitled, “ A Rebel Cipher Despatch Which Did Not Reach Judah P. Benjamin.”

A most successful reception to the ladies was given at the rooms in the Waldorf-Astoria on the evening of March 23d, and was largely attended. An excellent programme, which is here given, was rendered, followed by a collation:

The committee appointed to arrange for a reception to Ohioans in New York who were eligible to membership in the Society, organized by electing Charles W. Lefler chairman. Members were requested to send in the names of their friends, and to each of these the following invitation was sent:

MR. (Name of guest)

THE OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK REQUESTS

THE PLEASURE OF YOUR COMPANY

AT A

RECEPTION TO OHIOANS

TO BE HELD AT ITS ROOMS

AT

THE WALDORF-ASTORIA

ON MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 13TH, 1903

AT 8 P. M.

COLGATE HOYT,

PRESIDENT

FRANCIS M. APPLGATE,

SECRETARY

R. S. V. P.

TO

CHARLES W. LEFLER

CHAIRMAN

NO. 25 BROAD ST., N. Y.

COMPLIMENTS OF

(Name of Member)

There was a large attendance of members and guests at the reception, which took the form of a smoker, given on the evening of April 13th. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental music, and recitations, and was thoroughly enjoyed by all, even the wind-up of "Roasted Buckeyes in the Shell," and certainly none of the Buckeyes could complain that the "roast" was underdone.

At the meeting of June 8th Vice-President Ewing, chairman of the committee on Ohio centennial at Chillicothe, was unable to be present, but his brother, Hampton Ewing, made a full and able report on the centennial, and also presented as a gift from his brother a beautiful souvenir of the occasion. Mr. Jones offered the following resolution:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York desire to express its high sense of the honor in the erection and dedication of the St. Gaudens’ statue to the name and fame of Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman.” President Hoyt and others spoke eloquently on the subject, and the resolution was adopted.

In the meeting of October 12th the following gentlemen were elected a committee to nominate officers for the ensuing year: Milton I. Southard, James G. Newcomb, Warren Higley, S. Frederick Taylor, L. C. Ruch, Elmer O. Evans, Francis X. Butler.

The meeting of November 9, 1903, was one of exceptional interest. After a small amount of business had been attended to, a programme arranged by the entertainment committee was presented. Mr. Jones, director of music at Columbia University, gave several instrumental selections; Mr. Pennell, tenor solos, accompanied by Mr. Ball at the piano; and Mr. Rice, a monologue.

There were present as special guests, Dr. James Hulme Canfield, LL.D., librarian of Columbia University and ex-president of the Ohio State University, and Capt. Grote Hutchinson, U. S. A., who was present not only in his personal capacity as a guest, but also as the official representative of Maj.-Gen. H. C. Corbin, U. S. A., an Ohio man in command of the department of the East, who was unable to be present. The guests were introduced, and spoke in an entertaining manner, their remarks being here given in full.

Captain Hutchinson said: “Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen:—It is needless to say it is a great pleasure to be here, but I cannot but feel that I have been perhaps a bit badly treated in being asked to make a speech. The other day Mr. Watson came over to Governor’s Island to make a personal call on General Corbin, and invited him to come over to this meeting, and until to-day General Corbin had expected to come, but he found very suddenly and unexpectedly that he was called off to Washington this afternoon, and in his inimitably courteous way he turned and said: ‘Captain Hutchinson, I can’t go to the Ohio Society this evening. Go over and represent me.’ And that reminds me of last year, when Mr. Watson came over to Governor’s Island and General Chaffee was there, and General Chaffee being similarly called off on some duty, could not be here, so at the last moment, as evening came on, he said, ‘Hutchinson, I can’t go over to that Ohio Society to-night. You just go over and represent me.’ It seems a little bit ludicrous to me to be called upon to represent either Chaffee or Corbin. I cannot do it, however much I would like to, nor am I able to entertain you as they would, were either of them here. I feel that I cannot begin to do it, and, in fact, I feel, standing up before you, a good deal like an old Irish captain of mine once expressed his feelings. His name was—but never mind his name—he was a great character. I will not try to imitate the Irish brogue, as my predecessor here on the floor, Mr. Ross, has done, but this captain was a great character. He was one of those long, lean, lank Irishmen, with a red head, a lot of brogue and a hoarse voice. He meant well, and never said anything funny in his life that he knew of. One day he was trying to dress his company and wanted a soldier off on the left flank to get up on the line. He tried for a while to get him in line, but, failing, finally out of all patience yelled to his lieutenant, 'Lieutenant, lieutenant; I can't get that man up on the line. Will you please hit him a kick with your sabre.'

"Another time, when he had gotten himself rather disliked by the youngsters at the post—he was a bit of a martinet—there was a good deal of talk and gossip about him, as many of the young fellows wanted to get back on the old man. One day I was making a call at his house, and after twenty or thirty minutes got up to go, having made no reference to the gossip. Just as I was stepping down from the porch he said in a whisper: 'Hutchinson, they do be telling a lot of dom lies about me around this post, but I am sincere in every one of them.' (Laughter.) He was that kind of a man. I will give you the gist of the story I started to tell you. At one of the army posts we used to have an officer's school presided over by a major, and to this school the captains, as well as the subalterns of the post, were required to go. We usually had to recite in tactics, or drill regulations, were given tasks to study, and were called upon, of course, every afternoon, or two or three afternoons in a week, to assemble, and each would be required to get up and explain some subject to the major and to the assembled officers. Of course to the second lieutenants, most of them young fellows just out of West Point, the tasks came easy. They studied little and recited well. For the first lieutenants it was a little more difficult, but they generally got through creditably. The captains were older, and of the lot, of course, our Irish captain did the poorest. He was also the oldest captain at the post. This had gone on for a week or ten days, and after a particularly bad recitation on the part of our captain, and at which he felt very much mortified, he turned to the major and said: 'Major, and the officers assembled here to-day, I want to apologize for the poor recitations that I make. There is nobody at the post that studies tactics harder than I do. I don't suppose there is anybody in the post that makes as poor recitations; but,' he says, 'Major, Major, when I get out in front of my troop and I put my left foot in the stirrup, swing my body upon my horse, let my right foot swing over his croup and settle into my saddle, then, Major, my mind is pregnant with ideas.' I feel to-night a good deal like that old captain did when he was up before the recitation committee. I feel that I am making a very poor show, a very poor face at a speech or at entertaining you, but perhaps if you were a crowd of recruits lined up before me and I was captain, perhaps my mind would be 'pregnant with ideas.'

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“I don’t suppose that a man who has been nearly twenty-five years connected with the service of the United States, the army, as I have been, is expected to make much of a speech. It is proverbial how poor a speech an army officer makes, especially when he comes up unprepared as I am to make any speech at all. You will have to excuse me. I am delighted to be here; always delighted to meet Ohio people wherever they are, in any part of the world. I don’t believe there is any part of the world where you don’t meet Ohio men. I remember three years ago last summer, after we made the march from Tien Tsin to Pekin—and that perhaps is as remote a corner of the world as any one is apt to strike—there had been some fighting and a good deal of stress and strain on the part of our people up there. It was after we had been in the city of Pekin a week or ten days, who should walk into my office one afternoon but an Ohio man, an Ohio man who perhaps many of you know. He came with all kinds of letters. He had at that time no regular commission in the army, but a title as a volunteer A. D. C., with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He did not know just how he could find me, but he called because he was an Ohio man, and, incidentally, I don’t think he had much to do except to collect loot. That was another evidence of his being an Ohio man—Ohio men have a faculty of not letting good things go by.

“There is nothing else I can say to you, gentlemen, except that we would be very glad to see more Ohio men over on Governor’s Island. Of course that is a little tucked away corner of New York. We rarely have any of the representative gentlemen of New York come over to see us, but whenever they do come, we are always glad to extend them as hearty a welcome as the army has to offer in that small and restricted space.

“I might say before I retire that General Corbin was much disappointed at being unable to be with you to-night, and expressed the hope that he could be present with the members of the Society at its next meeting, and I am sure he is holding a date open to be present with you on the occasion of your annual dinner. I thank you gentlemen.” (Applause.)

Dr. Canfield said: “Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society:—I wish very much that I had the voice of that tenor to-night, instead of this bass voice, very bass voice; but I have brought this nine hundred miles in order to be here and that must partly excuse its condition. I believe it was an Ohio man who on a somewhat memorable occasion rode twenty miles in order to scatter a large armed force, and I take it for granted if he could ride twenty and accomplish that, at the end of a nine hundred mile ride I may be able to scatter some of you, as I see some of you are scattering already.

“I was a little in doubt as to the sort of an experience I should have here to-night. There is an expression in common use to-day which is very clear and distinct in its meaning to those who understand the highest forms and niceties of the English language, and that is the expression to 'string' a person. Evidently somebody has been 'stringing' me, because I expected this evening to encounter something of a mixture of the Quill Club of this city and the Gridiron Club of Washington, with the Authors' Club and the Century Club thrown in for good measure; and how one man could fit himself to all the different phases of thought and life that such an organization represents was quite a problem. Instead, I find the kindly faces of old-time neighbors and friends.

"You must not expect me to show my age by beginning with reminiscences. Of course, I could tell, for instance, that I was born in the old town of Delaware, and bathed in that memorable sulphur spring both night and morning regularly for some months, though really I do not think that has anything whatever to do with the present condition and reputation of the spring. Some honor and credit might be gathered from the fact that our next door neighbor was a young lawyer named Hayes, Rutherford B., and that his charming young wife was one of the helpers, who, in the absence of the trained nurses of to-day, came in and assisted the new minister's first boy into the world. I might even add that on the day of my birth dear old Dr. Williams was the oldest member of the faculty of Wesleyan University, and when forty-five years afterwards I came back to the state to take up educational work, he was still there, still the oldest member of the faculty, still at work; a delightful old man, as some of you may possibly remember.

"But it is never safe to go into details about oneself. I had a sad experience once, in this matter, when a youngster. I told just a little too much. I went to Chicago and stopped at the old St. James Hotel. The clerk pushed the register before me. It was the first hotel register I ever had to sign, for my father or some other member of the family had always done the registering. I looked at it with some trepidation, but wanted to make a good bluff and not look too green. I noticed that the record seemed to be made up of certain items. The first was evidently the date, August 7th. The next was the name of the patron of the hotel. The next evidently told the place where he came from. Then there was a column in which there were certain figures. I studied that for quite a while, and finally concluded it was where people who registered put down their ages. I wondered very much that they had been so many old men who had registered there that night, 97—82—86—77—91, but in order that I might show that I was up-to-date in every way and that I had traveled and was not green, I wrote my name and my residence, then New York, and added 21. I shall always remember with sinking heart the way I felt when the young fellow turned that book around and looked at the entry, and then smiled and said, 'That's all right, sonny, but that is the bridal chamber, and I do not think you want that.' I assure you, gentlemen, I feel now all that 'gopeness' that I felt then. When a man makes a break like that he always remembers it. No, it is not safe to say too much about oneself. Other people have gotten into trouble when going into details. I noticed not long ago that the governor of New Hampshire, who had with him the governor of Indiana, who had come to help him in a campaign, stopped a couple of bootblacks to have their shoes shined. The governor of New Hampshire began to talk about himself—very foolish thing—and said, 'Boys, you are doing now what you probably will never have a chance to do again; you are blacking the shoes of two governors. I am the governor of New Hampshire, and my friend here is the governor of Indiana.' The larger of the two boys looked up, and said, 'Is that so. Say, don't give it away, but I am Odell of New York, and this little runt here is the governor of New Jersey.'

"When I first received the invitation from the gentleman who has charge of the destinies of this club and of the destinies of the gentlemen who appear before you—perhaps it would be better to say of the destinies of the club and the reputation of the gentlemen who appear before you—I thought to go about this whole matter in a truly scientific up-to-date manner. I recalled that a gentleman in Cambridge, Mass., connected with a great university, not long ago published a statement based upon a careful study of 'Who's Who in America.' The results, facts and statistics which he said he found, were very peculiar. I thought I would examine the book and see if it could be made the basis of the few feeble remarks that I was destined to make before you this evening. I went through it very carefully. There were 14,876 names of distinguished Americans in the book (I may have the count wrong), my recollection is that 13,827 were born in Ohio. It is barely possible that this may be shaded a very little, and it may be a little over, but that will do for round numbers at least. Of the men born in Ohio not one, as far as I could determine, and I examined the book very carefully, not one of them has ever served a term in the penitentiary; or was ever convicted of any serious crime. The state that can breed and rear men who will so nearly fill to overflowing the only book of nobility, the only book of peerage, that this country possesses, is certainly a state of which one may be proud.

"Having completed the statistical study, the next step was that which we all take nowadays—we are learning the good old German method of thoroughness—that is, to get right on the ground and inspect. We call it independent work, research work. I thought it would pay to get on the ground. I left here about half-past five on Tuesday of last week. Parenthetically, it may not be out of place to add, that when I got to Philadelphia, being interested in the result of our city election, and having fifteen minutes there, I ran down to a telephone and called up a friend of mine who is connected with the press of this city, a gentleman noted for his shrewdness in affairs of state.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The conversation was in this wise: 'Who's that?' 'Canfield; what's the result?' 'What result?' 'The result of the election.' 'Where are you that you are asking about the result of the election?' 'I am in Philadelphia.' 'Are you?' 'Well, just keep traveling.' These were the only returns that I could get until, at Harrisburg, where I took a 61,000 mileage ticket, and kept traveling. It struck me that was about the best thing to do. I was going, however, in the direction of light and fresh air for I landed in Ohio, got other returns which were cheerful, and left there only yesterday. So if not the last, I am perhaps, the latest Ohioan who has come here to-night direct from the old state. It is very pleasant to be made the bearer of a personal message to this association from Governor Nash, whom I met in his office at the capitol last Saturday, with whom I had a very delightful conference, and he sent his warmest greetings to the Ohio Society of New York.

"Gentlemen, the one thought which always comes to me in connection with the life of Ohio and the history of Ohio and the name which Ohio men have made for themselves, and the one thought which I wish to leave with you to-night, is this: Ohio was the first evidence that was given to the world of the purpose and undertaking of the American people to create a great nation in this wilderness of God across the sea. If you had selected in the year 1800 five of the most competent administrators in this country, five of the ablest financiers, five men whose life and experience and success were such as to commend them to the confidence of the American people, and you had made them a committee on the creation and development and betterment of Ohio, and had put back of them the treasury of the United States and had promised them unlimited drafts on that treasury, and had said to them: 'Gentlemen, in less than a century make that wilderness blossom like the rose, give it a population of four millions, put a school house with open door within walking distance of every family in the state, establish industries and build factories, create cities and bring together innumerable smaller communities,' that committee would have laughed at you, its members would have resigned, and the nation would have said that it was the most preposterous undertaking the world had ever seen, and that any man who even dreamed of a movement like that was simply stark mad. Yet that thing has been done, and most magnificently done; done in the most intelligent and in the most thorough manner; done with a force never abating; done with an energy that was unconquerable; done with a determination that was never broken down; done with an optimism that has never for an instant yielded to any conditions or any circumstances and become that most contemptible of all things in an American citizen—pessimism. That dream was not realized by external power and force, it was not done by a committee of great men, of great financiers, of great administrators, of men who were particularly wise or experienced; was done by our fathers' fathers and the women who went with them into that wilderness. It was done by American common people, the most uncommon people God's sunlight ever shone upon. That is why we glory in the history of that state. It was the men who walked beside their white covered wagons day after day, as they sought this new home, and the women who sat looking out with tired and longing eyes, and yet eyes in which there was neither fear nor despair; these were the men and women who went into that wilderness and mastered it and made it the garden spot to-day. I speak of them as a common people—I mean exactly what I say. They were people along that great average line of American life, the line in which we all ought to believe most absolutely, and for the rise of which we ought to give thanks most religiously. It is a magnificent thing that many and many a man has gone beyond that average line, and is helping to lift that average because he has passed above it. It is a sad thing that there are thousands still below that average line, and apparently thousands will always remain below it and therefore drag it down. But it is a superb thing that by the combination of industry and integrity and intelligence that average line has constantly risen, has never once swung backward, and is still rising, and is higher to-day than the average of life in any country under the sun.

“These walls are eloquent with the portraits of distinguished men. Not a single man here who did not come out of exactly that type of American family. Not one in those frames who was not, in the best sense of the word, a self-made man, and with no reason to be ashamed of his job. That is all the American asks, the self-respecting American; freedom in his choice of way, and freedom in his right of way after he has entered upon it. He has back of him the American public school, and side by side with him the American public anxious to see him succeed. He lives in a country in which society is not stratified, in which there is freedom of movement from the top to the bottom as well as from the bottom to the top, for we still in this country send the evil men down as well as help the good men up. This is a country in which the likeliest is still to be found in the unlikeliest places. Look over the men you see here, the men whose faces are upon these walls, and see if that last statement is not exactly true. I rode last Saturday towards old Worthington, near the farm where Chase as a boy followed the cows, where he lived with his uncle, then bishop of that state. Whoever dreamed that the boy who had gone there simply to get the elements of education would ever be the man standing as he will stand for all time with a resplendent reputation among the most resplendent Americans. That is the glory of Ohio, that is the glory of this country from start to finish, that must be the glory of this country for all time to come. We are safe in this country just as long as we give our attention to that great average American line—we are safe just as long as we are willing to recognize that in the common people and in the whole people lie wholesomeness and strength. These men became great leaders, that is true; but not one of them could have written his name upon the scroll of fame if he had not had an intelligent following. A leader is a very necessary thing in this world, but an intelligent following is that which makes for success. These men had back of them men who could understand the situation, who could think with them and feel with them, and move as one man because they moved toward a common end, with a common purpose, born of a common hope, all quickened and guided by common intelligence. We are what we are to-day, gentlemen, because we have kept close together, as men kept close together through those pioneer days in the upbuilding of our state; and we cannot afford to go apart under any circumstances whatever. We sent down to the front during that great struggle for nationality young fellows who seemed frail, so physically frail and weak and unenduring, that we wondered that they could possibly bear the struggle and the trials and the stress and strain that came with camp life and forced marches and the lying out under the silent stars. They were maintained by the magical touch of the elbow, man to man they felt an electric thrill, which told them they were working in a common cause and that each stood by the other. We must keep that magical touch of the elbow, gentlemen, if we are to succeed, and we must keep it in absolutely good faith. As I came back over that nine hundred miles, swift as the wind itself, almost absolutely safe, was I dependent upon the chiefs of administration, the men who stood at the head of the different departments of these great railways? Yes, in a certain sense; but infinitely more dependent upon the intelligence and the integrity and the good faith and the loyalty of common men, working men, who in their daily lives, and toiling on during the night, made it safe for me to journey as I did. I tell you, gentlemen, the history of the Western states is the history of a people who kept together, who thought together, who felt together, who were stirred by one purpose, who were sympathetic through and through. We cannot afford under any circumstances whatever to go away from that old idea. When I think of Ohio to-day, of what it means, of what it has stood for in all the past, of what it stands for to-day, the greatest lesson that it can possibly teach is the lesson which I have tried to give you in just these few words to-night. I am going to leave that thought with you just as it is, without amplification, with no argument, no illustration. Simply take it, turn it over in your minds, fill out the outline, round it out, make it attractive, make it forcible, if you will. It is the one thought continually present whenever the history of this country is studied carefully with consideration, with the thoughtfulness which every American ought to study, the history of his own land.

“I give you in closing this sentiment: ‘The Ohio man, the men of the past and of the present, and, God grant, of the future; men who have been kingly citizens and citizen kings, may they never be dethroned.' ”

The annual meeting of 1903 was held at the Hotel Manhattan on the evening of November 30th, as the 29th fell on Sunday. After dinner had been served, reports of the various committees and officers were presented. That of the treasurer was very comprehensive, and showed the total assets of the Society to be $12,755.05. The report of the governing committee was as follows:

“ Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society of New York:

“ Your governing committee beg to report, and with pleasure, that our Society has continued to grow during the past year, both in acquiring new members and adding very materially to our bank balance.

“ November 29, 1902, our membership numbered 286 resident and 159 non-resident, or a total of 445 members. To-day we have 308 resident and 197 non-resident, total of 505 members. We have elected during the year 99 members, and lost by death, not qualified, resignation and non-payment of dues 39 members, leaving a gain of 60 for the year.

“ Our worthy treasurer will read you his very interesting report, which will show the members how we have improved our financial condition during the year, our present bank balance being the largest the Society has had during its existence.

“ The entertainments provided by our entertainment committee, together with the large reception given at our rooms to Ohioans living in New York city and vicinity, were the means of bringing us many new members, and your board of governors recommend that these entertainments be continued during the coming year, as the members and their friends are brought together in a sociable way, becoming better acquainted and more interested in the welfare of the Society.

“ We trust the members will use their best endeavors to further the interests of our Society in a manner that the good showing at the end of the coming year will eclipse any of the previous ones.

“ Respectfully submitted,

“ JAMES G. NEWCOMB, Chairman.”

The Society proceeded to election of officers for the coming year, and the following named gentlemen were chosen unanimously: President, John J. McCook; vice-presidents, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Louis D. Clarke, Lowell M. Palmer, Eben B. Thomas, J. D. Layng; secretary, Francis M. Applegate; recording secretary, Charles W. Morris; treasurer, Samuel H. Parsons; trustees, Leander H. Crall, Horace H. Brockway, Andrew McClean Parker.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Mr. Hoyt, the retiring president, expressed his hearty appreciation of the honor the Society had done him in electing him its president in the past, and regretted his inability to serve longer in that capacity, on account of other duties which would render it impossible for him to again take the office. Mr. Hoyt said: "Fellow members of the Ohio Society of New York: This is the last time that I can speak to you from the president's chair, so if I am going to speak to you from that chair I must do it now. I am reminded of the story of a certain Irishman who was dying, and his friends gathering round him, he called them together, and, whispering, said: 'Now, boys, when its all over and ye take me out to the simetry I want yez all to stop at Tim Murphy's saloon on the way out and have a good drink.' They said: 'O, Pat! Never! We won't do that. We'll stop at Tim Murphy's coming back.' 'The devil you will. You will not stop coming back; you'll stop going out, because then I'll be wid yez.'

"But, joking aside, gentlemen of the Ohio Society, I've been your president now for two years. Circumstances over which I have no control render it impossible for me to hold the office longer. I want to say to you that in my entire life I have never held an office with as much pleasure as the office of president of this Society, and the reason for that is because no man ever presided over a better body of men than the Ohio Society of New York, and as I must leave this chair now I want to say from the bottom of my heart that I am delighted to have follow me that magnificent, that gallant son of Ohio, Col. John J. McCook. We Ohioans are proud because he belongs to the 'Fighting McCooks,' and we defy any other state in the Union to produce ten in one family and fifteen in two, every one of whom fought for his country. Ohio alone could raise nine sons and a father that could fight through the Civil War—and all but one, by the way, were officers—unusual for an Ohioan—and that one had an office offered, but declined it.

"And now, gentlemen, as the seventeenth year of our existence has closed, and we are entering on the eighteenth, I can only bespeak for my successor the support—the loyal support—that all the officers, all the members of the different committees and every member of the Society has always given me. Gentlemen, I love you all, and I cannot help it; and now, Colonel McCook, if you will rise, I will take great pleasure in fastening around your neck the insignia of your office, the president's badge. Your neck is much larger than mine, but I think it will go around.

(Mr. Foyé proposed three cheers for the retiring president, which were given with a will.)

"Now, gentlemen, before our new president really gets started, I propose we all fill our glasses, and, standing, drink to the health of Col. John J. McCook, the president of the Ohio Society of New York."

COLONEL JOHN J. MCCOOK
President from November 30, 1903 —

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

(All fill their glasses and drink to the health of Colonel McCook, and give three cheers and a tiger.)

Colonel McCook said: "Mr. Hoyt and fellow members of the Ohio Society: I know of no honor which can come to a man who was born in Ohio and lives in New York equal to that of being elected to the presidency of the Ohio Society. It would not be true to the truth of things if I did not say that I am very proud to have had that honor conferred upon me.

"The satisfaction and pleasure that I feel upon my promotion is coupled with the sad consciousness that as an organization we are losing the official services of Colgate Hoyt, who has been an exceptionally able and successful president of this Society. I am painfully aware of the fact that it is no easy thing to follow in his footsteps, and very well know that my efforts will be fruitless and a failure unless I have the loyal support of the other officers and members that has always been given to Mr. Hoyt while he has been president of the Society.

"No one could listen to the reports that have been made here to-night by the chairmen of the respective committees without feeling that this is no one man organization. An active president can, of course, be very useful, but he cannot accomplish all that he ought for the Society without the loyal, hearty support of his fellow officers and of the chairmen and members of the various committees, and of the great body of the membership of the Society. I know that I cannot accomplish anything as your president unless I have that support. I crave it, and must have it. I ask it to-night not for myself alone, but for the highest and best interests of this Society, which we all respect and honor.

"The Ohio Society in New York stands for something. It is made up of representative men. We are often asked what it is that makes the Ohio man successful in business and in public life, whether he remains in his own state or journeys abroad, whether his career is in politics, in the army, in the navy or in the public service. There is no time to-night to give in detail the reasons for this; but there are reasons, and good ones, too, to account for the exceptional and successful part taken by Ohio men in the commercial and public affairs of our country.

"The dominant and controlling factors in this matter have been well presented by an old Painesville boy, Alfred Mathews, now of Philadelphia, in his valuable book recently issued, entitled 'Ohio and Her Western Reserve.' This is a splendid book, that makes every right-minded Ohio man more proud of his state, and I recommend each one of you to get a copy and read it as soon as possible. My recommendation is all the more earnest from the fact that much of what I say to you is taken from the book, either by way of adopting his ideas or by using Mr. Mathews' exact words.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Under the almost universal law of natural selection, the men and women who, in the first instance, tore themselves away from the hampering restrictions upon human rights, as they existed under the despotic governments then prevailing in Europe, and crossed the seas to find a new home in America, were the very best of their respective countries. They loved and longed for the right to exercise freedom of thought, and for personal, religious and political liberty. They hungered for the right to live and govern themselves in a new land where freedom of conscience and high ideals could flourish amid prosperity and plenty.

“Under this law of natural selection the men and women who stood ready, by emigrating to America, to meet and overcome the dangers of sea and land, of storm and tempest, of hostile Indians and of fell disease, were people of strong bodies, possessing great physical and moral courage. They were master spirits who dared to live up to, and, if need be, to die for what they believed in. Impelled by a mighty and masterful purpose, they overcame every obstacle, founded the American colonies and established this nation, of which we are all so proud.

“As Mathews points out, New England was peopled chiefly by the Puritans from old England; New York by the Dutch and English; Pennsylvania by the Quakers, Germans and Scotch-Irish; Virginia again by English, but quite different from those who settled Massachusetts and Connecticut; and Maryland by still another element.

“The children of these first emigrants, coming from the best family and racial stock of their time, were the ones who fought through the Colonial and Revolutionary wars and secured for themselves and for their descendants freedom and independence from European domination.

“The great Ordinance of 1787, that surpassingly wise enactment of an early Congress, which was only less important than the Constitution of the United States, and which may not improperly be regarded as the ‘ordinance of freedom,’ opened up the magnificent and almost unlimited territory northwest of the Ohio river, and by law dedicated it forever to religious, personal and political freedom and to the establishment of schools and of the higher education.

“These kindred and congenial principles grew and developed there. The announcement of these constitutional provisions drew to the Ohio territory, by that same law of natural selection, all the best elements of the American colonies. Mathews again says that of the states not included among the original thirteen, but admitted to the Union before Ohio, Vermont was settled by people from Massachusetts and New York, Kentucky by those from Virginia, and Tennessee by those from North Carolina, but Ohio was settled by people from all of these, by elements from each and every state in the confederacy; in other words, Ohio was settled by the people of the United States. Hers was the first territory to be absolutely representative of the entire people. Within her borders the hitherto racially different or long-separated consanguineous elements—in some instances estranged, in others emasculated—or enervated through dearth of fresh blood—came into contiguity—finally to be blent into a homogeneous whole, and so to advance by another stage—and a huge one—the evolution of a race. It would savor of extremism to go further and to say that these once widely dissevered and dissimilar elements coming together in a virgin land, not only advanced an old, but founded a new race; and yet, what were these elementary fragments in the old states but colonies of English Puritans and Cavaliers and Quakers, of Scotch-Irish and Germans? And, in a certain sense, were not the Ohioans truly the first Americans?

“We thus have in the people of Ohio a new race of men, the most distinctively American men, the true composite American, the first of his kind that has been produced upon this continent. (Great applause.) Why should not such men succeed wherever they may be? They and their immediate ancestors were born right; they had lived right; they possessed the highest ideals of patriotism, and they were ready to fight, and if need be to die for the right. They possessed the elements of the highest manhood, and, gentlemen, facing you as I do to-night as your official representative, it would not be modest for me to express or for you to listen to anything more upon that line; but there are good reasons why Ohio is the state she is and why Ohio men are the men they are.

“Members of the Ohio Society, you are here in a representative capacity in this metropolis of the great New World, and as such you have a mission to perform. I do not feel it is altogether selfish when I call upon you one and all to sustain in every possible way the best interests of this Society. If during the course of this year you receive communications not only from the other officers of the Society, but possibly a personal note from me, asking you to do this thing or that which will advance the interests of the Society, by increasing its membership or in any other way, I hope you will feel and respond to the obligation which rests upon you to comply with such requests.

“I have already said too much; more than I intended; but I do wish to express my hearty appreciation of what has been done for the Ohio Society by Mr. Colgate Hoyt, the retiring president, and by the chairman and members of the respective committees. I beg, and I know I shall not ask in vain, that those efforts may be continued in the best interests of our Society and thus maintain the high character and reputation of the great state, of which we are all so proud.” (Great applause.)

In introducing Governor-elect Herrick, President McCook said: “We have the pleasure of entertaining to-night a gentleman that I have the satisfaction of calling a personal friend. About a month ago the leaders in the campaign in Ohio were concerned about the outcome of the elections—some of the leaders, I should say, not all. But the alarm or concern that was then felt seems to have been without foundation, for when the election came about the gentleman who is our guest to-night, the governor-elect of Ohio, the Hon. Myron T. Herrick (great applause), was elected to the governor's chair of Ohio by the largest vote ever given for any citizen by the people of that state. I think the last time I heard the figures there was a plurality of 126,000. I understand that our guest is so popular out in Ohio that all the people in the state who did not vote for him are sorry, and would now like to be counted in and change their votes. The polls are closed, and the figures are made up, but we have the satisfaction of knowing that our fellow member, the next Governor of Ohio, will be a man whom we can all respect and honor. We can look upon his career with unbounded satisfaction. I will now ask Governor-elect Herrick to favor us with a few remarks." (Great applause.)

Governor Herrick said: "Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society: It gives me an especial pleasure to meet with this warm reception from the members of the Ohio Society. I congratulate you upon the election of your splendid president, Colonel McCook. It is not unlike my own election in some respects—in its unanimity. I am certain that Colonel McCook's case will not be like that of the man who was sent to Congress. He went in with little opposition, and when he went out there was none at all.

"I noted with pleasure the intense interest taken in our contest in Ohio from all her devoted sons throughout the country. It may be truly said, 'Once an Ohioan, always an Ohioan.' I find here to-night many former Ohioans, gathered from all parts of the country—all interested in their native state. I am reminded of the story of the little girl, who said to her mother: 'Mamma, where was I born?' 'You were born in Texas.' 'Where was papa born?' 'He was born in Maine.' 'Where were you born?' 'Why, I was born in Ohio.' 'How in the world did we ever all get together?'"

Governor Herrick then devoted some time to the recent election in Ohio and other matters of local interest, and in conclusion said:

"When two men stand for the great office of the Presidency of the United States it is of the utmost importance that the platforms upon which they stand, whatever names they bear, should line up for these principles of our republican form of government, for it should be, whether in state or national elections, first, our country; second, our party.

"If the result of our campaign has been to strengthen the old line Jeffersonian Democratic party, to that I say 'Amen.' (Applause.)

"The nation has confronted several emergencies of this kind during its national life, when the people were called upon to place patriotism above party—business interests above politics—once in 1860 and again in 1896. The people, apparently, when sorely oppressed, wander away from their anchorage, but in good time they return again to the fold, and it is always gratifying to know that after all the smoke and noise of a great campaign have subsided, there after all has been no danger. The sweet spirit of patriotism and nationalism, higher than they, rise above all party and factional antagonisms, and we find ourselves still upon firm foundations. I thank you, gentlemen.” (Great applause.)

President McCook, in introducing the next speaker, said: “We have with us to-night, as a guest of honor, our fellow member, a gentleman that this Society always delights to honor and delights to listen to—the Hon. James H. Hoyt, of Cleveland, will now speak to us.” (Applause.)

Mr. Hoyt said: “I have been thinking since I have been sitting here of certain startling and deplorable changes that have occurred in our political and civil life since I last had the pleasure of meeting with you at one of your annual meetings, only two short years ago. It would be unseemly and improper for me to discuss the causes of those changes. We might differ about them, and I would not want to sound any discordant note here. Causes that might seem to me to be simple might strike you as complex.

“Nevertheless, the changes that have occurred in these two years are facts, and as patriotic sons of Ohio, and patriotic Americans, it would be well for us to consider these changes.

“Only two years ago the North and South seemed to have forgotten everything except that their sons had stood together on the decks of government war vessels cleared for action, and had won glorious victories for the Republic, while the Stars and Stripes floated at the mast-head. They had forgotten everything except that they had suffered together for a common cause, had slept together under one tent, and lain side by side in hospital cots. There was no strife between them except the patriotic strife to see who could go forward the fastest and the farthest. Together they had carried Old Glory up the blood-stained heights of El Caney, and planted it in triumph there. But now it seems as if the North and South were further apart than they have been since Sumter was fired upon.

“When I met with you two years ago business men were prosperous and hopeful. New enterprises were being inaugurated, and all the various activities of our commercial life were healthful. Now an unrest seems to have smitten the business interests of the United States. Two years ago the ‘race question’ seemed to be somehow solving itself. Now it is one of the burning issues of the hour. Two years ago the relations between capital and labor seemed to be fairly satisfactory. Capital was voluntarily increasing wages; labor seemed to be reasonably content. Now capital seems never to have been more harassed and troubled, and labor never so discontented; and, as I am speaking here to-night, four cities of this Union are substantially under martial law, in order to protect the lives and property and rights of citizens.

“Now I am no pessimist. Like Governor Herrick, I believe in the future of the Republic, and I am strengthened in that belief because, just at this anxious and troublesome time, Ohio has again spoken for good government and for common sense. We have had an election in Ohio, you will remember! It happened just twenty-six days ago. You may have heard of that election. I agree with the governor that it would not be a proper subject for discussion on a non-partisan occasion like this if it were in any sense a partisan triumph; but it was not a partisan triumph. It was just as much a victory for good Democracy as it was a victory for good Republicanism. It was the triumph of sanity over insanity; of the school-house, the college, the church, the counting-house and the factory over the lunatic asylum. It was the triumph of order over disorder, of good government over bad government, or, rather, over no government at all. It was the triumph of the peaceable, grateful flame that burns on the American hearthstone over the lurid flame lighted by the torch of incendiarism. It was the triumph of intelligence over ignorance, of discretion over ‘crankism.’ We laid two ‘cranks’ away to rest out in Ohio last month, and the Angel of Freedom, who is always present when we have an election in Ohio, wrote a certain handwriting on the wall, which is a warning to all other ‘cranks.’ It was a great victory! It brought peace and inspiration to the hearts of thousands of patriots. It gave them new courage.

“Why is it that we won such a signal victory in Ohio? I will tell you the reason, my friends, in my judgment. Mr. Herrick was elected governor of the state of Ohio by the largest majority ever given a governor, and Uncle Mark Hanna will be sent to the senate of the United States by the largest majority that any legislature ever gave to any senator from Ohio; not alone because Mr. Herrick is intelligent and able, and had obtained the confidence of our people; not alone because Uncle Mark Hanna, the stalwart, the unflinching, the indomitable, the generous and the far-seeing, stood for all that is best in our national life, but because, and chiefly because, these two men were the most conspicuous friends of one of the greatest men Ohio has ever produced. They were friends of William McKinley, and if any national administration was indorsed by the people of Ohio at that election, it was the last administration of William McKinley.

“Colonel McCook has said that some of the Ohio men living here in New York regretted that they could not come out to Ohio and vote at that election. I regret, and deeply regret, that we Ohio men who live out home could not have come here to New York, and voted at your election.”

Colonel McCook: "We certainly needed the votes more than Governor Herrick and Uncle Mark!"

President McCook called attention to the fact that there were two ex-presidents of the Ohio Society present—Gen. Henry L. Burnett and Hon. Milton I. Southard. He felt that a few remarks from them would be in order. Both gentlemen responded briefly to the point.

General Burnett said: "Mr. President, Fellow Members of the Ohio Society:—I think it is waxing late, and we have heard much speaking and of a high order, and I will not make you a speech. It seems to me that there is but a word to be said, and of personal greeting, perhaps, and a word of eulogy I want to say for our retiring president. His incumbency of this office I have watched, and worked with him at times, and he has excited my profound admiration. He brought to bear in the executive work here in the administration of his office those same great business and administrative qualities he had displayed throughout his business life. He gave to his work an enthusiasm, a tact and a diplomacy unparalleled. He has made the Society during his administration more successful than it has ever been before. I congratulate him upon his good work, and I congratulate you that he was your president. He is succeeded by a gentleman whom I have known long and honored much, one of the first citizens of this state, standing at the head in our profession, in the law. He is honored by the bench and bar, and is a man, a 'kindly man, moving among his kind,' a man whom we all honor and esteem. He will give you a good administration. He succeeds to a difficult task, following brother Hoyt, but we will give him our loyal support. I ask you all to gather about him in fellowship, in loyalty, in enthusiasm, to keep this Society to the front in the future as it has been in the past. You stand to-day recognized by the whole of this nation as the first society in the state of New York. You stand first as men of affairs, as men of intelligence. You take the membership of this Society, and you will find in this body the men that are the moving spirits of the great financial, the great commercial, the great business interests of this city. In every department of life you have the vigor and the force and the intelligence, and you have moved to the front for that very reason. Now stand by him. Put this Society to the front, and stand as you have stood in the past, as the first of the great social bodies here in this great metropolis. I thank you." (Applause.)

Mr. Southard said: "Gentlemen of the Ohio Society:—I had hoped that I would be let alone to-night, and I am very grateful to General Burnett for reminding you that the hour is late; but whether early or late I promise you not to detain you long.

"I am very much disappointed in the character of the speeches which we have had here to-night. I had hoped that they would be of a character that would give place to a little story that I thought about, but they have been of that unquestioned, sober-minded, elegant character that a story would scarcely fit. (Colonel McCook: 'Tell it.') I have got to tell it because I haven't anything else, but I have to apologize for telling it. A new senator came into Washington some years ago, and he didn't wait long for an opportunity to make a flamboyant speech, and he felt, whether any one else did or not, that it was the great event in the history of his country, and somebody asked Senator Hamlin what he thought of the speaker's effort. 'Well,' he says, 'it reminds me of an old story of a farmer down near Portland, Maine. He came into town on a very cold day with a load of hay. He sold his hay and came into the hotel and stood around the fire for a time warming himself, and then asked the proprietor if he could not give him a drink. 'Well,' he said, 'you know we cannot sell here; it is a temperance town. We cannot sell anything by the drink.' 'Haven't you got nothing you could let a fellow have?' 'Well, I could let you have a bottle of champagne. That is all I can do.' 'Let me try it,' he says. He took it. It was poured out, and he drank it down, wiped his lips and seemed to enjoy it; put his hand in his pocket to get his wallet to pay for it. 'How much is it?' he says. '$2.50?' '$2.50! that is all I got for my load of hay. The drink was pretty much all froth at that.' That was the way that speech was." Now, you see it has no application here to-night, for we have had no froth.

"Now, I don't know what I am standing here for, as I surely haven't any speech. I, of course, could lend my compliments to our retiring president, and could reiterate and indorse all that has been said before. With the Ohioan 'nothing short of too much of a good thing is enough,' so I give it my most hearty approval. He has given this Society an exhibition of executive ability, of energy and indomitable effort in seeing that banquets were properly organized. He has had few equals and no superiors. He had, of course, preceding him, our splendid president General Burnett. We had supposed when he retired that we never should have good banquets again, and we have felt year by year something of an apprehension as to the future. How will we get another banquet to equal the last has been the solicitious inquiry. But when the next comes we think it the best we have ever had, and I guess it is true. And so, my fellow members, we need have no fear for the future. The selection of Colonel McCook as our new president is one that gives earnest of the greatest hope and promise. We know that the standard of this Society will still be maintained in the future, and it is a standard, too, that we may well be proud of. And it is one fraught with important consequences, for as we stand each year at our annual banquets in this city we are standing before not only the five hundred or a thousand that may be present, but we are standing before eighty millions of people, for what is said and done at these banquets is heralded by the Associated Press from one end of the country to the other. We have a high mark, therefore, at which we must aim. Let us strain to make our sayings and doings in the future in keeping with the past, ever aiming, however, at still higher and better achievements, and our sun will not set."

The president then said: "The time has come when we should separate, and before doing so it has been suggested by some one present, for which suggestion the officers of the Society are not, of course, responsible, but as it seems to be a good one, it is possible our governing committee will take it under advisement. The suggestion is that an excursion should be made up of a delegation to return this visit of Governor Herrick by our going to Columbus at the time of his inauguration. (Applause.) It is not within our province to take any action upon such a recommendation to-night, so I simply refer it to the governing committee for their consideration. Before we part or adjourn to-night I feel that we would not have done our whole duty unless some member of the Society feels it in his heart to move and another to second a motion which I certainly will most gladly put, namely, a vote of thanks to our retiring president and to such of the officers and members of the committees who retire this year, for their very efficient and splendid work in the interests of the Society."

The motion was duly made, seconded and carried unanimously and enthusiastically by a standing vote and cheers.

Mr. Southard said: "Before you close I would like to suggest an excursion of Governor Herrick to the Ohio Society banquet that will take place in the course of a few weeks."

The president said that in due course the banquet committee would be announced and the annual dinner arranged for.

Upon motion duly made and seconded the name of the guest of honor of the evening, the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, was placed in nomination for election as an honorary member of the Society, which election under the constitution and by-laws can only be at the next regular meeting of the Society. (At the next regular meeting of the Society, Governor Herrick was unanimously elected an honorary member.)

The president then declared the annual meeting adjourned.

On December 14th the following house committee were elected by the governing committee: Andrew J. C. Foyé, chairman; L. D. Morrison and Norman C. Raff. Flamen Ball Candler was elected chairman of the governing committee. In the Society meeting on the same night, President McCook announced the standing committees as follows: Literature and art: Charles H. Niehaus, Albert Shaw, Carleton Chapman, Robert Johnstone Mooney, Peter F. Collier; entertainment: Addison W. Gilmore, Merrill Watson, Frederic

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

M. Nicholas, Francis X. Butler, Sturgis Siegler Dunham; Library: Emory A. Stedman, P. Tecumseh Sherman, Edward J. Wheeler, Daniel Pritchard, James Sherlock Davis;* auditing: Louis D. Clarke, Edward H. Childs, Charles W. Lefler, Lewis C. Ruch, J. M. Chandler; historian: James H. Kennedy; chaplain: Bishop William A. Leonard.

Mr. Hoyt moved that the Society have a banquet the coming winter and that the president be authorized, at his convenience, to appoint a committee. It was so ordered. Mr. Hoyt also moved that a committee be appointed by the chair to take into consideration the celebration at Athens, Ohio, in the succeeding June. The motion prevailed and the following gentlemen were named as such committee with power to add to their number: Thomas Ewing, Warren Higley and Samuel H. Parsons.

An amendment to the constitution, previously proposed by James H. Kennedy, creating a membership committee † and defining its duties was taken up for consideration and adopted; as was also one providing for a library committee, and also defining its duties.

Mr. Crall read a letter from the first treasurer, Col. William Perry Fogg, saying that some years ago he had brought a buckeye tree from Ohio and planted it in his yard at Roselle, N. J., and had gathered a peck of genuine buckeyes from it and would send one for each plate at the annual meeting. A vote of thanks was tendered Colonel Fogg.

* There seems to have been a change in this committee subsequent to the above, as a later announcement gives the library committee for 1904 as follows: Winchester Fitch, chairman; P. Tecumseh Sherman, Charles D. Hilles, Daniel Pritchard, Frederic L. Matthews.

† The first membership committee appointed by the president under this authority was constituted as follows: James H. Kennedy, chairman; Colgate Hoyt, R. J. Chard, James G. Newcomb and Emory A. Stedman.

CHAPTER XX

1904

AT the meeting on January 11, 1904, ex-President Southard presided in the absence of President McCook, who, with Mr. Hoyt and other members of the Society, was attending the inauguration of Governor Herrick, at Columbus, Ohio. The following telegram was read:

“COLUMBUS, O., January 11, 1904.

“Governor Herrick inaugurated amid great enthusiasm. Special arrangements had been made at exercises in State House, on reviewing stand, at governor’s reception, and at all social functions for the twenty members of the Ohio Society of New York who were present.

(Signed) “HOYT AND MCCOOK.”

By formal vote of the Society the following response was immediately placed upon the wires:

“Hon. Myron T. Herrick, Governor of Ohio, Columbus, Ohio.

“The Ohio Society of New York in session this evening has instructed me by an unanimous vote to extend our hearty congratulations to our fellow member, the new Governor of Ohio.

(Signed) “M. I. SOUTHARD.”

Mr. Kennedy, the historian, reported he had spent a very pleasant afternoon with Col. William Perry Fogg at his home in Roselle, N. J., and conveyed to him personally the feeling of the Society toward him. He then proposed the name of Colonel Fogg for honorary membership, to be acted upon at a later meeting. Mr. Niehaus, chairman of the art committee, displayed a picture of a buckeye tree, amid great applause. The following resolution, offered by Mr. Crall, was adopted:

“WHEREAS, It is deemed highly desirable to have prepared a correct chronological history of the Society from its inception and organization, therefore, be it

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“Resolved, That the governing committee be, and it hereby is, authorized and requested to cause such a history to be prepared, and to employ such assistance in the work, at such compensation, as it may seem proper, and also to appoint a special committee of five members to supervise and approve the work.”

Mr. Applegate, secretary of the banquet committee, reported that said committee had held a meeting and decided to hold the annual banquet on the evening of March 5th, and it was presumed that Governor Taft, the new Secretary of War, would be the guest of honor, he having accepted an invitation to be present.

At the meeting of the Society on February 8th, Mr. Candler reported that pursuant to the resolution passed at a former meeting, the governing committee had appointed the following as a committee on the history of the Society: Hon. Milton I. Southard, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Judge Warren Higley, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Leander H. Crall.

It was remarked as a matter of sad interest in connection with this meeting, that while one committee presented resolutions in memory of Hon. Charles Foster, ex-governor of Ohio, another was appointed to take similar action in regard to Hon. Asa L. Bushnell, another ex-governor of Ohio. William Perry Fogg, the first treasurer of the Society, was unanimously elected an honorary member. The Society was, after the business meeting, entertained by Tappen Adney, a member, in an interesting and instructive talk on “The Klondike Stampede,” illustrated with stereopticon views.

Another pleasant and successful reception to the ladies was given at the rooms on February 18th, at which the following programme was rendered:

- a. “Caprice,” Sinding
- b. “The Butterfly,” Lavalle

Mr. Harold S. Briggs.

- a. “Thou’rt Like Unto a Flower,” Snow
- b. “Because,” d’Hardelot

Mr. F. M. Nicholas.

- a. “Preislied aus Meistersinger,” Wagner-Wilhelmj
- b. “Ronde des Lutins,” Bazzini

Miss Marie Nichols.

- a. “The Nightingale’s Song,” Nevin

The Army and Navy Banquet given by the Ohio Society of New York, at the Waldorf-Astoria, on the evening of Saturday, March 5, 1904, with Hon. William Howard Taft, Secretary of War of the United States, and recently Governor of the Philippines, as the chief guest of honor, was a great success in every meaning of the word, and worthy to be classified with the former remarkable gatherings of a similar nature, held under the auspices of this organization, of which this was the eighteenth. In addition to the Hon. Secretary of War, there sat at the president's table, a number of other gentlemen prominent in connection with these two arms of the national service, or distinguished in other walks of public life. Among them were:

Hon. George Edmund Foss, member of Congress from Illinois, chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs.

Hon. Charles B. Landis, member of Congress from Indiana.

Lieut.-Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. Army.

Rear-Admiral J. Crittenden Watson, U. S. Navy.

Hon. Charles H. Darling, Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Maj.-Gen. Henry C. Corbin, U. S. Army.

Rear-Admiral Frederick Rodgers, U. S. Navy.

Capt. Willard H. Bronson, U. S. Navy.

Hon. Myron T. Herrick, Governor of Ohio.

Hon. James E. Campbell, ex-Governor of Ohio.

There were other gentlemen of prominence present, a list of those invited to seats at President McCook's table being here given:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

PRESIDENT'S TABLE

Mr. Robert L. Harrison, President Southern Society
Mr. Colgate Hoyt, of New York
Hon. Nicholas Longworth, M. C., of Ohio
Mr. Robert C. Ogden, President of Pennsylvania Society
Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D. D., of New York
Hon. Robert W. Taylor, of Ohio
Capt. Willard H. Brownson, U. S. N., U. S. Naval Academy
Hon. Benjamin F. Tracy, of New York
Rear-Admiral Frederick Rodgers, U. S. Navy
Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, U. S. Senator, New York
Lieutenant-General Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. Army
Hon. George Edmund Foss, M. C., Illinois
Hon. Charles Dick, U. S. Senator, Ohio
Hon. William Howard Taft, Secretary of War
Mr. John J. McCook, President Ohio Society
Hon. Myron T. Herrick, Governor of Ohio
Hon. Charles H. Darling, Assistant Secretary of the Navy
Hon. Charles B. Landis, M. C., Indiana
Rear-Admiral J. Crittenden Watson, U. S. Navy
President Nicholas Murray Butler, Columbia University
Major-General Henry C. Corbin, U. S. Army
Hon. Edgar M. Cullen, of New York
Hon. Charles P. Taft, of Ohio
General James H. Wilson, of Delaware
Hon. James E. Campbell, of Ohio
General Grenville M. Dodge, of New York
Hon. Louis Stern, of New York
General James S. Clarkson, of New York
General Thomas H. Hubbard, President New England Society
Mr. William Butler Duncan, President St. Andrew's Society

The first step looking to the banquet was taken on December 14, 1903, when ex-president Colgate Hoyt moved that a banquet be given in 1904, and that the president be authorized to appoint a banquet committee to have the matter in charge. The motion was carried without dissent, and at a later date, President McCook announced the following committee:

Milton I. Southard, chairman; Colgate Hoyt, Henry L. Burnett, White-law Reid, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Lowell M. Palmer, Andrew J. C. Foyé, John D. Archbold, Eben B. Thomas, Flamen Ball Candler, Louis D. Clarke, Warren Higley, Leander H. Crall, Thomas H. Wheeler, David Homer Bates, A. D. Juilliard, Ceilan M. Spitzer, Rush Taggart, J. G. Schmidlapp, William C. Beer, S. H. Parsons, treasurer; James H. Hoyt, Henry W. Taft, Charles Dick, James G. Newcomb, George W. Perkins, John H. Patterson, Jay O. Moss, Charles A. Moore, Francis M. Applegate, secretary.

The gentlemen thus officially placed in charge of arrangements recognized from the first that the presence of that stalwart and able son of Ohio, the Hon. William Howard Taft, who had made so great a success as governor of the Philippines, and who was even then named as the coming Secretary of War, would make the banquet a success even though no other guest who might be bidden, should come. President McCook cabled him at Manila some months before and received the answer that it would be impossible for him to accept.

President McCook immediately sent another cablegram to Governor Taft, telling him that he must come, and that Ohio would take no refusal as final, and to this were attached the names of Senator Marcus A. Hanna, Senator Joseph B. Foraker and governor-elect Myron T. Herrick. Back came an answer under the sea, and that answer was, "I accept."

Thus secure in the presence of the coming Secretary of War, the banquet committee set the machinery in motion to secure other prominent representatives of the army and of the navy. That success crowned their efforts, the list of names above given will verify.

Arrangements were made with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for a special car, in which to bring the guests from Washington. Gen. Henry L. Burnett, ex-president of the Ohio Society, and himself a distinguished officer of the union army in the Civil War, went to Washington, as an escort representing the Society. Secretary Taft had come to New York in advance, having another engagement, but the others came in the special car, reaching New York a little after 3 p. m. on the day of the banquet. They were met at the depot by a committee consisting of Hon. Milton I. Southard, Judge Warren Higley and Mr. R. J. Chard, with carriages, and taken direct to the Manhattan Hotel.

The members of the Society and their guests began to arrive at the Waldorf at about 6 p. m., and found the members of the banquet committee and reception committee on hand to receive them. The gentlemen who had been named as members of the reception committee were as follows:

Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; R. J. Chard, Mason Evans, Francis B. Swayne, George A. Beaton, L. C. Ruch, S. Frederick Taylor, L. D. Morrison, C. D. MaGrath, Charles C. Tegethoff, Henry D. Lyman, H. J. Morse, Adolph S. Ochs, Norman C. Raff, David Robison, Jr., Charles D. Hilles, H. B. Brundrett, P. Ryan, Cass Gilbert, Orrel A. Parker, Warner Ells, E. W. Oglebay, Frank D. Pavey, P. Tecumseh Sherman, Frank W. Hubby, Jr., Winchester Fitch, Charles D. Palmer, Dr. Roland Hazen, Lyman Spitzer, Walter S. Sullivan, William H. Jackson, Nicholas Monsarrat.

A little later Secretary Taft and the other special guests were escorted to the Waldorf, where an informal reception was held in the Astor Gallery. The doors of the banquet hall were thrown open in due season, and the members and their personal guests took their positions at the tables and remained standing. The members assigned to escort the special guests to the table of honor and the gentlemen whom they were to seat, were as follows: Hon. William H. Taft, escorted by President John J. McCook; Hon. G. E. Foss, by Judge Warren Higley; Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, by R. J. Chard; Hon. C.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

M. Depew, by H. B. Brundrett; Gov. M. T. Herrick, by Ralph H. Beaton; Hon. Charles B. Landis, by Milton I. Southard; Rear-Admiral Watson, by L. D. Morrison; President Nicholas M. Butler, by F. B. Swayne; Gen. H. C. Corbin, by Orrel A. Parker; Hon. Charles P. Taft, by W. H. Jackson; Gen. Grenville M. Dodge, by George F. Granger; Hon. Charles H. Darling, by Mason Evans; Hon. Robert W. Taylor, by James H. Kennedy; Robert C. Ogden, by H. J. Morse; Rear-Admiral Rodgers, by S. F. Taylor; Hon. B. F. Tracy, by Adolph S. Ochs; Hon. Edgar M. Cullen, by W. S. Sullivan; Hon. James E. Campbell, by Patrick Ryan; Gen. James H. Wilson, by Winchester Fitch; William B. Duncan, by Lyman Spitzer; Robert L. Harrison, by Clayton E. Strong; Hon. Nicholas Longworth, by Merrill Watson; Capt. W. H. Brownson, by Louis H. Severance; Hon. Louis Stern, by Charles W. Leffer; Gen. James S. Clarkson, by P. Tecumseh Sherman; Gen. Thomas H. Hubbard, by Charles H. Niehaus.

There was perhaps never a time in the record of the Waldorf-Astoria when so many tables were set in the banquet hall. There were about sixty of these, and those that could not find a place in the main room were set in the palm garden, or corridor, adjoining, the doors of which were removed for the occasion. In most cases there were ten to a table, making over 600 present.

The immense hall was a beautiful sight when the doors were thrown open. Each table was adorned with flowers. Back of the president's table the wall was a bank of American flags. Flanking this were the various flags, pennants and signals of the army and navy, and the shields of Ohio, New York, and of the United States.

Each man who was present, whether of Ohio birth or not, proudly wore a badge consisting of ribbon bows of green and gold, the colors of the Society, attached to a buckeye. These emblems of Ohio came from two sources—a part of them from a tree on the farm of the late Senator John Sherman, at Mansfield, O., and a part from a buckeye tree transplanted from Ohio to his estate at Roselle, N. J., by Col. William Perry Fogg, first treasurer of the Ohio Society of New York.

The souvenir provided for the occasion, one of which was at each plate, was an artistic and very appropriate piece of work, setting forth as it did the record of the American army and navy. The following features which it contained are well worth commendation:

A series of pictures of some of the great battles that have been fought by our army and navy in the course of our national history; pictures of Bunker Hill, the action between the ships Ranger and Drake, that of the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis; Perry's victory on Lake Erie, the battle of New Orleans, the storming of Chapultepec, a view of Fort Sumter prior to the bombardment, the fight between the Monitor and Merrimac,

Eighteenth Annual Banquet

of the

Ohio Society of New York

Given for

The Honorable

William Howard Taft

Secretary of War

at the

Waldorf-Astoria

Saturday evening, March Fifth

Nineteen Hundred and Four at six-thirty o'clock

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Antietam, Gettysburg, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, the battle of Mobile Bay, the battle of Manila Bay, the storming of San Juan Hill, Santiago, Tien-Tsin.

Portraits of George Washington, John Paul Jones, Oliver Hazard Perry; of Jackson, Scott, McClellan, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Shafter, Worden, Farragut, Dewey, Sampson, Schley, Chaffee—an epitome in black and white of men who have shed honor and glory on the army and navy of the United States.

This artistic souvenir was prepared by a special menu committee constituted as follows: Samuel H. Parsons, chairman; Charles H. Niehaus, Carlton T. Chapman, Howard Chandler Christy.

In accordance with the custom inaugurated several years ago, seats in the boxes of the two balconies about the banquet hall were assigned to the wives, daughters and lady friends of the members. The doors were opened previous to the speaking, and not only were all the boxes filled, but chairs were set back of them, and not one was empty. Each lady had a seat assigned in advance.

Before the guests were seated, grace was said, in the absence of Bishop Leonard, chaplain of the Society, by Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D. D., of New York.

President McCook made an ideal toastmaster. He construed his duties not to lie in speech making, but in the introduction of the orators of the evening. He did this tersely, to the point, and ever in a happy manner.

At 9:30 Colonel McCook arose, and the presentation of the orators of the evening began. The programme arranged for this feature of the evening's entertainment, was as follows:

TOASTS

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The members of the Society and their guests will respond by standing while the band plays "The Star Spangled Banner."

THE UNITED STATES IN THE PHILIPPINES

Responded to by the Hon. William Howard Taft, Secretary of War.

AN ADEQUATE MODERN NAVY, IN CONSTANT READINESS, THE BEST SAFEGUARD OF NATIONAL PROSPERITY AND PEACE

Responded to by the Hon. George Edmund Foss, M. C., Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

THE SONS OF OHIO

Responded to by the Hon. Charles B. Landis, Member of Congress from Indiana.

OUR NATIVE STATE, OHIO, THE MOTHER OF US ALL

Responded to by the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, Governor of Ohio.

THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Responded to by Lieutenant-General Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.

THE AMERICAN NAVY

Responded to by Rear-Admiral John Crittenden Watson, U. S. N., Farragut's Flag-Lieutenant, and now the Senior Rear-Admiral on the Active List of the Navy.

Colonel McCook said: "Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of New York; our Honored Guests; Ladies and Gentlemen:

"In behalf of the Ohio Society of New York, it gives me very great pleasure to extend to you all a hearty, cordial, buckeye greeting. That reference to the word 'buckeye' creates enthusiasm, and it is proper for me to refer to the fact that the buckeyes which you are wearing upon the lapels of your coats to-night, came from the old farm, in Richland County, of the late Senator John Sherman, of blessed memory, and came to us through the courtesy of Mr. William Perry Fogg, one of the oldest members of this Society.

"The buckeye has become a symbol of loyalty, and the sons of Ohio are proud of it, yes, we are all proud to call ourselves Buckeyes.

"Owing to the efficiency of my predecessor in office, Mr. Colgate Hoyt, and the secretary, treasurer and other officers of this Society, I am able to report that it is in all respects in a most prosperous condition. Financially, its treasury has a larger credit balance than ever before. At the annual banquet a year ago, we had 435 members, and this year we have 536. I would like to say to the gentlemen who have so strongly expressed their approval of the report of our enlarged numbers by applause, that they can do no better thing for the Ohio Society than to show their interest, not by the use of their hands in clapping, but by signing proposals of properly qualified men for membership in this Society. (Applause.)

"While the Society has many causes for congratulation, with so many strangers among us as our guests to-night, we will not dwell long on family matters. It is only fitting, however, to refer to the fact that while we have been rapidly increasing in membership, we have also been seriously depleted by death. Fifteen members of our Society have died since the last annual banquet:

Hanna was the friend of all true men. I will not trust myself to express the regret that I feel personally, or that the members of this Society feel, in the loss of that great man. As others of the speakers will make full and adequate reference to Senator Hanna, I will not take your time by trying to give expression to what ought to be said in his memory.

“We had expected, when this dinner was arranged for, to have Senator Hanna with us. He accepted the invitation and expressed anticipations of pleasure at being here to-night. A successor has been elected to take his place in the Senate, and we had hoped to have him with us. I have received the following telegram from General Dick:

“Your telegram and letter much appreciated. Regret exceedingly the demands upon my time during the coming week, due in part to senatorial election Tuesday and Wednesday, will absolutely prevent my reaching New York in time for Ohio Society’s banquet next Saturday evening, as much as I would prize this opportunity to join with the members of that splendid organization in its most commendable effort to properly honor the Secretary of War. My best wishes are extended for a highly successful banquet.

(Signed) “CHARLES F. DICK.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ I will read but one other telegram, and that is from my predecessor in office, the genial Colgate Hoyt. (Applause.) He had planned to be with us to-night, but he has gone to the South, and telegraphs this morning from New Orleans as follows:

“ Deeply regret I cannot be with you this evening. Please convey best wishes to all present at the banquet, and especially to our honored guests.

(Signed) “ COLGATE HOYT.”

“ We have now passed from the material part of our programme, to that of a higher and more intellectual type. Loyal and as in duty bound, the first toast upon an occasion like this should always be to the President of the United States. I will ask you to stand so that every one may respond to this toast to the President of the United States, and remain standing while the band plays the Star Spangled Banner.”

(The President's name was received with applause and the company enthusiastically joined in singing “ The Star Spangled Banner.”)

President McCook continued: “ This is not the proper occasion, and if it were the proper occasion, I would not venture to take your time to explain—or perhaps I had better say demonstrate—the circumstances and conditions out of which the fact grew or evolved itself, for it is a fact, well recognized by the American people, that Ohio men are very successful in reaching political and official preferment. There are many good reasons for this, but I will spare you from listening to my recital of them.

“ In this presence, however, you must bear with me while I make brief reference to one of the most brilliant and remarkable examples which Ohio has up to this time produced, of a worker and winner in public office.

“ We all well know that the American, as a man, and especially in an official position, develops capacity to accomplish a great many different kinds of things. We well know that there are many Americans who have been successful journalists; we all know that a considerable number of Americans have been and are successful judges in our state courts; we also know that a smaller number, but we are thankful to say an adequate number, of successful judges have been developed in our federal courts; but it has remained for the guest of honor of the evening to demonstrate that America can and has produced a man who in addition to performing all these functions in the most satisfactory way, is also a highly successful Oriental administrator and governor. (Applause and cheers.) We never had to tackle that kind of a job until recently and an Ohio man has done the trick. (Laughter and applause.) I will not dwell upon the great and diverse abilities exhibited by our guest of honor in the various positions which he has so honorably and so splendidly filled, but no one questions that what he has done in the Philippines as the civil governor of our possessions in the East, is not only unique in being the first of its class, but it is also unique in the results he has accomplished. It was not simply the civil administration of an Eastern province, for many Anglo-Saxons have accomplished that under the British flag. He went into a country far to the South, with a people entirely different from anything we had ever known or had practical experience with in this country, living under laws different from ours, based upon the Latin and not the Anglo-Saxon or American systems. He brought to bear upon the conditions prevailing in the Philippines the patient industry and learning that had stood him in good stead in the state and federal courts of this country, and he was enabled to outline and put into effective operation a government and laws which were workable under the complicated and difficult conditions obtaining in the East.

“He not only accomplished that and did it well, but he governed the men of that far off Eastern country in such a humane and intelligent way that they not only gladly accepted the law he established, but looked up with confidence and affectionate regard to the man who administered it and called him their best friend, yes, even by a higher name, they called him ‘Taft the Just.’ (Applause.) It is much more difficult for any human governor to be just than to be gracious or generous or even able, and when people governed under such conditions can look up to their governor in that way, and bid him farewell as they accompanied him to the ship, with tears in their eyes, because they hardly dared hope to see him more, it was a wonderful tribute to what an American, a cultivated, intelligent, high-minded American could do under very adverse circumstances.

“We have all come here to-night expecting to hear from the Secretary of War, upon the United States in the Philippines. No other man in the world is so able to speak upon that subject, and I consider that we, the members of the Ohio Society, and our guests, are greatly privileged in having Secretary Taft address us upon that subject to-night. It gives me the greatest possible pleasure to present to you our brother Buckeye, the first American who successfully governed our possessions in the East, and then returned to govern us here at home, as some day he undoubtedly will do, our Ohio friend, the Honorable William Howard Taft, Secretary of War of the United States.”

Hon. William H. Taft said: “Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Ohio Society:

“I am greatly honored by the invitation to address you this evening. I received that invitation before I left the Philippines, by cable. I was conscious of the number of official engagements which would necessarily confront me, and, therefore, much as I deplored the necessity, I sent a cable to your president declining the honor. I then received a cable—which ran in this wise:

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ ‘It is deemed of the utmost importance that before sailing, you should cable accepting McCook’s invitation to the Ohio Society. (Signed) HANNA, FORAKER, HERRICK.’ (Applause and laughter.)

“ I considered that a cataclysm had been reached in the politics of that good old state, and that probably something was necessary to bring about a reconciliation, and if I could be offered up as a fatted calf, I was willing.

“ I had heard of the Ohio Society of New York for many years, and I knew of their distinguished hospitality, in which so much wit and reason flowed over the board, but I had no idea, gentlemen, of meeting so formidable and distinguished a company as this to-night. It is delightful for me to find that here in this city of New York, where there is a danger sometimes that it should be thought that the sun sets in Hackensack (laughter and applause), there are so many gentlemen of the Ohio blood who know at any rate that the sun sets as far west as the Ohio valley. To-night I am to invite your attention to islands and their history which I fear most of us did not know that the sun set upon at all, some ten years ago.

“ What is that history? We need not go back more than four hundred years to study the ethnographic history of the islands before 1,500. Doubtless the American sovereignty and the American interest in those islands will sometime develop most interesting history of the tribes that make up the Filipino people, but it is sufficient for what I have to say to-night, to call your attention to the fact that four hundred years ago, Spain with her warriors and her priests entered that island and remained there until she left in 1898. Magellan, that bold warrior, whose statue and monument we still have in Manila, landed at Cebu, and was shot upon the island which lies just opposite to the present town of Cebu. Legazpi founded the city of Manila, and Urdeneta, the Recoleta monk, accompanied him. On the Luneta, which is a driveway and public promenade, about the centre of Manila, north and south, facing Manila Bay, and the most conspicuous site in all the archipelago, is a monument chiseled by a Spanish artist, and erected after it reached the islands, by the American military government. It is a monument of two figures. Legazpi stands with his sword unsheathed, in his right hand, and holding in his left the standard of Spain. Urdeneta, the monk, stepping just in front of him, holds in front of the standard of Spain, the holy cross. The statue is instinct with motion, instinct with valor, instinct with the courage that carried those men into exploration and into civilization and into Christianization. In the center of the same Luneta is reserved a round space for the erection of a monument to Rizal, the hero of the Philippines; the man who four hundred years after the coming of the Spaniard, sought to improve the government of Spain, and in his efforts was consigned to death, and there, upon that same Luneta, fell with the bullets of a file of Spanish soldiery.

HON. WILLIAM H. TAFT

“ Now, the Spaniards were not all wicked. We have a way of disposing of people with two or three adjectives, and letting them go. As a matter of fact, Spain was at the height of her power in those days, and her men were heroes. They enacted the laws of the Indies. Those laws were on the whole a very fair set of laws, but the difficulty arose in their later administration. At one time, Spanish statesmen said to the King, ‘ These Philippine Islands give us nothing of profit, they give us no gold, they give us no spices such as the Portuguese get; why should we not abandon them?’ They were met on the other hand by the members of the religious orders who said, ‘ There are millions of souls here to be saved, and Your Majesty cannot leave these islands; you cannot abandon them.’ And they stayed. And those friars Christianized great numbers, by their efforts as parish priests through that archipelago, until to-day we have nearly seven millions of Christians, and the only Christians of the Malay race in the world.

“ Higher education was introduced for the few; the great mass were kept in a state of Christian pupilage, if I may call it such; but there were a few who were educated; and coming down to this century, in 1870, when republicanism visited Spain, those ideas came into the islands and affected a number of the educated Filipinos.

“ The friars had obtained such control over the people of the islands, that the Spanish king, was quite willing to remit to them not only all the religious functions in the islands, but also the civil functions, and as a consequence there fell upon the Spanish priests the business of the detective, of the policeman, of the schoolmaster, and every other civil office; and when persecutions were begun for doubtful political views, it was the friars who were charged with instituting them. The friars were large landlords. I don’t know, I don’t think, in fact, that they were oppressive landlords, but the fact that they were landlords, the fact that they were policemen, the fact that they were priests, all together, created after 1870, a feeling of bitter hostility against them. As this feeling increased the friars departed from an earlier policy—indeed, they had even before 1870—of encouraging the natives to become priests. In the early part of the century, and before, Filipinos had been made priests and bishops, but later on, for the last thirty or forty years, the education of the Filipino priests was quite defective and none of them were advanced to preferment in the Church. It was this that led to the so-called revolution of 1870, when Burgos and a number of other native priests were killed in Cavite.

“ Coming down to 1896, the feeling was sharpened again, and we had the insurrection of 1896, in which Aguinaldo won his spurs. That insurrection was settled by what was called the treaty of Biac na bato. The insurrection had been practically worn out by the Spanish soldiery and they were glad to make a treaty. It was brought about by the intervention of two or three very active gentlemen who wanted to bring it about, and who perhaps hoped to share in the rewards, and so represented to one side that the oral part of the treaty meant one thing and to the other side that it meant another. As a consequence, when the money was paid, which was paid under the treaty, it took very little to satisfy each side that the other had been deceiving it, and as a consequence in 1898, when Dewey went to the islands, it was exceedingly easy to raise another insurrection.

“Rizal had been shot before 1898. His aim had been not revolution, but an improvement in the Spanish administration and the removal of the abuses, including the exercise of political power by the friars. But after his death the insurrection took on a different shape and Andres Bonafacio developed the Catapunan Society, which spread rapidly over the entire islands. He was not a man whose character was the highest; indeed, a number of murders, it was said, had stained his hands, and in the custom which prevailed in the politics of those days, he retired into a mountain, and was removed. It was charged, and Mabini says so, that this was at the instance of Aguinaldo.

“The insurgent government was organized at Malolos. A convention was called, and a very creditable constitution was adopted. That convention consisted of very few popular representatives of the six or eight provinces about Manila. All the rest of the representatives were appointed by Aguinaldo to represent the other parts, the other forty-five provinces in the islands. About this time there arose a difference between Aguinaldo and General Otis. It became known to the Filipinos before it became known to the Americans that Aguinaldo was determined to break with the Americans. That is now established by a written document in which it was agreed on a Junta at Hong Kong, between Aguinaldo and others, that they should go to the islands, that they should get guns from the Americans, that they should, with the guns from the Americans, drive the Spaniards out, and then that they should use those guns to drive the Americans out. That created a split among those who had supported Aguinaldo in making up his government, and those who were known as Americanistas withdrew to Manila. Meantime the insurgent government had been carried out in some six or eight provinces; governors had been appointed and a form of government instituted. The oppression and corruption of that government it needs no testimony to develop. Any one who visits the islands and converses with those who were subjected to its iron rule will be able to tell you that Spain in her palmiest days was not able to equal the oppression and tyranny that prevailed during the eight months in those eight provinces.

“Now I think you all know and recollect as well as I can state it the dilemma in which the United States found herself after Dewey's victory and after the signing of the protocol. What were we to do? Were we to turn the islands back to Spain? Had we done so doubtless Spain would have sent forces there and probably reconquered the islands at great loss of blood and life. But we did not approve the government of Spain, and we had entered a kind of alliance with the insurgents in their efforts to assist us. Second, could we turn the islands over to the insurgents? I know upon this point there is a great difference of opinion. I don't think there is any difference in regard to the obligation which we were under with respect to those islands. The movable property and a great amount of the building property, if I may call it such, belong to foreigners. Were we to leave the islands then, the protection of that property, being an international obligation, either fell upon us or justified some other nation in entering the islands to protect that property. When you consider that the real bone of contention between Aguinaldo and General Merritt was that Aguinaldo was not permitted to enter the city of Manila in order that they might have the justifiable loot which they had been fighting for, you may understand the great risk that would be run in trusting to that government to protect international rights. Third, we could take the islands ourselves; and we did. (Applause.) It is suggested that we might have formed a protectorate, that is, that we might have seen a government formed; that we might have stationed our navy in the bay; that we might have said to the foreign nations, we will see that your property is protected, but we withdraw all power from ourselves to protect it; we will assume the responsibility of this government, without retaining the right to see that it is a proper government. That course the government did not adopt, and it proceeded then to administer a government of the Philippine Islands for the benefit of the Filipino people. Was it wrong in so doing? (Cries of 'No, No.')

“In the first place it should be taken into consideration that the sovereignty of the islands was by lawful treaty transferred to us, and admitting, if you please, that a large body of the Filipino people were opposed to our rule and wished to be independent, a question not at all free from doubt, we were in the attitude of being a lawful sovereign over a territory in which the people sought to remove our sovereignty. Now, what was our obligation under those circumstances? It is said that the principles of the Declaration of Independence required us to leave the islands to the people of the islands, on the ground that the just rights of government must depend upon the consent of the governed. I deny that the Declaration of Independence, when construed under the circumstances under which that instrument was signed, bears any such construction when applied to different circumstances; circumstances so different from those which prevailed at the time of our Revolution. (Applause.) That instrument was signed by men who themselves made an exception of minors, insane persons, women and slaves. That instrument was signed by men who upheld the property qualification in many of the states, that did not permit a majority of the citizens to vote and to consent to a government in those states. Why, then, should we extend that instrument to mean that the Hottentots are better able to make a government for themselves than a civilized government into whose hands the Hottentots may be thrown? If you follow the construction of the Declaration of Independence, you must come to this conclusion: That a government of a people, an independent self-government of a people, no matter how bad, is always better than a good government of one people by another. And I say that that is not a fact, and that history has a number of examples to show the contrary. (Applause.) The Declaration of Independence is a sacred instrument in our history, but is there any reason why we should not look history in the face and recognize facts? Is there any doubt in the mind of a single person who hears me that the condition of Egypt to-day is far better than it ever would have been had England not gone there and governed that country for the benefit of that people? Is there any doubt in the mind of a man who hears me that the government of San Domingo, had it been placed under our control one hundred years ago, would have been vastly better than the state of social dissolution in which it finds itself to-day? Why sacrifice truth to phrases? The words of the Declaration of Independence, as applied to the men to whom they did apply, were the truth. Those were men, descendants of men who for six hundred years in English history had been hammering out their right to self-government, and who for two hundred years after they came to these shores had, in fact, enjoyed self-government. Will you compare them with a people like the Filipinos, fit as they may be in the future for self-government, who thus far, under four hundred years of Spanish rule, have never known what it was to exercise political rights? Why, gentlemen, are politics so different from the ordinary affairs of life that the same simple reasoning does not apply to both?

“Now, gentlemen, are the Filipino people fitted to enjoy self-government? I know that people, and I yield to no one in my affection for the people, and in my appreciation of their merits. They are a courteous people; they are a kindly people; they are a people who have fought for what they regarded as their liberty; they are a brave people. I think they were misled in so fighting, but I honor them for the effort. They are a people, however, ninety per cent. of whom are in a state of Christian pupilage, utterly ignorant, and utterly unable to exercise the slightest political franchise. There are ten per cent. of them, hardly so great a number I should say, who can speak Spanish, and that marks the line of the educated, competent people, and those who are not. But they are a bright people, and I am not decrying their possible future fitness, their capacity for development; but I am saying that the United States, charged as it is with the wardship of this people, would do those people a crime now that by the force of circumstances it has had to take them under the wing of its sovereignty were it to set them adrift and, in the language of some statesmen, 'Let them go to the devil.' (Laughter and applause.)

"Now it has been suggested that while they may not be ready for popular self-government, they are ready for a self-government like that of Japan. Japan is an imperial government; the Japanese people were a feudal people; they owed allegiance on lines of chiefdom; the chiefs controlled their followers, and the Mikado or the Shoguns controlled the chiefs; and it was possible to build up an empire on such a people. But the Filipino people have no such tribal or feudal relations. The four hundred years of Spanish rule utterly destroyed any real tribal relations, and as a consequence there is no government that can be built on what exists there, unless it be a government under the guidance of another government, or unless it be popular self-government. Hence it is that there is nobody to whom the United States could turn over the responsibility of government, as it might in a country like Japan.

"Now, it is said that we took the islands from greed of conquest. Well, perhaps we did, but I was in the neighborhood immediately after the islands were taken, and I had the honor of a number of close confidential talks with William McKinley, and it may be that he was influenced by the greed of a Napoleon and was in favor of extending the power of the United States into those far off tropic islands; but if he was, and if that was the attitude of his mind, he most successfully concealed it from me. What was on his mind when I talked with him was the tremendous sense of responsibility for those people in those islands. I said to him, Mr. President, I was very sorry that we went to those islands; and said he, You are not a bit sorrier than I was; but, said he, we have them, we cannot take one island and not take the rest; we were in a situation where we must act, and I hope we have acted for the best. But, said he, no man can be more sorry than I am, for the tremendous trust that we have assumed, and no one more sincerely regretful that we had to assume it.

"It was in this spirit that William McKinley sent a commission to the Philippine Islands for the purpose of carrying out the policy which he announced when the war of the insurrection was at its height, and continued to announce, no matter what the conduct of the inhabitants of those islands, that we were there for the benefit of the people of those islands, and intended to govern those islands for the benefit solely of the Filipino people. The Philippines for the Filipinos was a motto, the maxim which William McKinley directed his commission to follow, and that, I think I may say, that injunction the commission has faithfully kept. (Applause.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“When the commission reached the islands there was a state of war, subdued much at the time the commission reached there, but in the following fall it revived again. The commission was sent out with the idea of offering a contrast to war, of offering a contrast to the army, by following close upon the heels of the army with the organization of civil government. And I think it is not too much to say that that attitude of President McKinley, with the army in one hand and the commission in the other, was what led subsequently to the ceasing of the war. I do not, for a minute, desire to detract from the tremendous work of the army in those islands. No man who was there and knows the privations to which our soldiers were subjected can but feel proud of such an army. Under conditions that required the separation of the army into six hundred different posts, there were found first and second lieutenants, and sergeants and corporals that were able to plan campaigns and to illustrate the independent self-reliance of the American soldier. (Applause.) But I must still insist that the policy which McKinley inaugurated was an element, and an important element, in bringing about the surrender of all those who could be called insurgents at all.

“And now, gentlemen, what has been done in the Philippines? A great government has been organized, a government of some eight hundred municipalities, of thirty-eight provinces, all of which collect as taxes possibly fifteen millions of dollars, gold, and disburse it in carrying on that government. The islands have been policed, a system of judiciary has been established; and I do not think I state the case too strongly when I say that the criminal laws of the Philippine Islands are enforced with much more justice, much more certainty, than in half of the states of the United States.

“It is said every once in a while, in order to point a sentence or roll off a rhetorical period, that the rights of free speech are denied in the islands, and that if a man read a declaration of independence in any town in the Philippine Islands it would subject him to imprisonment. That is not true. During the war and while the war was at its height it was true. It was declared to be unlawful to advocate independence either by peaceable or violent means, and it was done because it was thought that at that time, with men in the field, the people would not be able to distinguish between an advocacy of peaceful means and one of violence. When the war ceased, by the terms of the statute, the statute itself ceased to have effect.

“Then it is said that there are sedition laws in the islands, which there are; and so there are in many of the states of the United States. They are not contrary to free speech. If a man incites people to resistance to the government, unlawful resistance to the government, or to disturbance, it is a new doctrine that to arrest him and put him in jail is a violation of the rights of free speech.

“ Then we have libel laws, and criminal libel. A man who states something about somebody else that is not so, reflecting on that somebody else, is sued, not on the civil side, but on the criminal side of the court, and lands in jail, and the American editor wants to know how this is done. Can it be possible that under the Starry Flag an editor may not say something that is not true about another man and escape jail? (Laughter and applause.)

“ The trouble is that in the argument about free speech, the limitations of free speech in any free country are not very well understood. In those countries so fortunate as this country is, in which it is not necessary to enact all the laws that may be enacted under the constitution, to preserve the rights of individuals, because so many wrongs are allowed to go without vindication just because vindication of them would take too much trouble; but in a new country, in a country like the Philippines, where with a strange people that are unused to the freedom of the press, it is necessary that laws should be enforced which might be passed and be entirely legal here, but which are unnecessary here and yet are necessary there, without violating in either place any part of the constitution.

“ And now, how are we preparing the people for self-government? We have organized some eight hundred municipal governments in which there is complete autonomy in the sense that the municipal officers are all elected by the people, that is, by the people who can qualify themselves to vote, and the qualification for voting is either that they should speak Spanish or that they should have been municipal officers before, or that they should speak English, or that they should pay taxes; I think $15 Mexican a year. That makes an electorate very much less than the number of people, but it is the only electorate that seems possible there, and I have heard no criticism from the people in regard to it. In the provincial government, the governor is elected, the other two officers of the provincial board are appointed; the other provincial officers who are not in the board are also appointed under civil service rules. In the commission there are three Filipino members appointed, who sit with the five American members; an appointed legislative body of eight.

“ Two years after the publication of the census, which I hope will be completed in October, there is a provision that executes itself upon the proclamation of the President, requiring the commission to divide the islands into not less than fifty, and not more than one hundred districts, from which are to be elected representatives who will constitute a legislative assembly, whose vote shall be necessary to pass any law after it shall meet.

“ Now, gentlemen, I think that is a record which justifies us in claiming sincerity in our effort to teach these people how to govern themselves. (Applause.) We have a civil service law which prefers the Filipino to the American, other things being equal. Of course, at the outset, in organizing American offices with a few Filipinos who could speak American—English or American-English (laughter and applause)—it was natural that the number of Americans should far exceed the Filipinos in the higher offices, but I am glad to say the Filipinos are learning English and are fitting themselves to fill those offices, and as we shall fill the offices with Filipinos we shall be able to reduce the cost of government, because the Filipinos in their own homes are able to live for considerably less than Americans.

“We are sending one hundred Filipinos a year to this country to be educated here, that they may see on the ground and breathe in the atmosphere of our free institutions, and carry home the ideals which they shall form here in the most formative period of their lives, and make them understand what Anglo-Saxon freedom means. (A voice, ‘It ought to be a thousand.’) There are a great many difficulties in government, and one of the first difficulties is in raising the funds with which to carry it on. The enthusiasm with which the Filipinos rushed in to have us bring over 12,000 teachers was only equaled by the hesitation and reluctance which they exhibited when we called attention to how much we would have to increase taxes in order to bring that number over. We have thus far succeeded in paying our own expenses of government. It is true, the Congress of the United States last year, because of the rinderpest and the cholera and the heavy expenses to which we were subjected, and the fear that there might be famine, voted $3,000,000, and that we were delighted to get, and we are using it so far as we may in the improvement of roads, the construction of school-houses, and furnishing work to the people of that character; but on the whole, the government is self-supporting, and if the United States, if the Congress of the United States, if the people of the United States treat those islands with the generosity that is only justice, considering the circumstances under which they came into our hands, those islands will flourish like a green bay tree, and will ask for no charity from these United States. (Applause.)

“I have alluded to the question of the friars. Their presence in the islands, an alien race, hostile for the reason of the story of their being there, presented a most difficult question for settlement, and it seemed to be the American method of settling a question to go directly to headquarters to see whether it could be settled; so Rome was visited and a reasonable basis of agreement established. We attempted to have a contract by which the friars should be gradually withdrawn from the islands; but his holiness the Pope was not willing to make such a term part of the contract for the sale of the lands. He did say, however, or rather his representative said, that it would be the policy of the Papacy to withdraw the Spanish friars as soon as they could be substituted. An apostolic delegate was sent out, and for a year and a half negotiations were had with the promoting companies into whose hands

the friars' lands had been put, and on the 22d day of December those lands were sold for something over seven millions of dollars to the Philippine government. At the same time the friars, who had numbered something over 1,000 in 1898, 370 in 1902, had been reduced on the 1st day of December, 1903, to 246. Of those there were some fifty who were so infirm that they could not return to Spain, and could not do parish work. Eighty-three Dominicans had renounced the doing of parish work; so that the number of friars who now remain in the islands for parish work are not enough to continue the agitation or make the basis of any quarrel with either the Aglipyans or the anti-friar Filipinos. I think it may be stated that the friar question is largely settled. (Applause.)

“In the matter of education, there are 4,000 teachers engaged in instructing the Filipino youth. I have heard it stated, have seen it written, by gentlemen who profess to know much of the Philippine Islands, that the educational system there established is a failure. Well, it is not all that it ought to be. It is not all that it ought to be because we are not able now to teach in those schools more than ten per cent. of the students of school age; but the most encouraging sign is the eagerness with which those people seek to learn the English language and seek a general education in English. People ask me why that is. Well, in the cities, doubtless, it is explained by the fact that it is expected that American merchants will go there, and also it is expected that if one goes into an office he will get a higher salary if he knows English than if he does not. But in the country no such explanation can be offered, and the only explanation I can give there is that it is a natural desire to be educated, and that in the Spanish times most of the people, most of the children of the poor people were denied an opportunity to learn Spanish, but now that they have an opportunity to learn English, they take that opportunity to learn the language of the race which is there as a sovereign, as evidence of the equality of opportunity that is offered them under the American flag. (Applause.) We have a very large normal school system. I say very large, not so large as we would like to make it, but there are three or four normal schools with constant attendance of two to three hundred each. We teach the Filipino teachers English and other branches, that they may become the teachers of their own people; and until we shall increase the number from 4,000 to 10,000 or 12,000, possibly 15,000, we shall not have accomplished our purpose.

“But, gentlemen, I beg of you to think of the unreasonableness of the American people; I feel it myself. When I begin something of an interesting character that I hope is going to come out all right, I want to see the evidence of it next morning at breakfast. So it is with most Americans, they are not content to wait. You cannot change a people in three years. You cannot change a people in a generation. You have got to trust to time. But I say that if you trust to time, and if your representatives in the islands and your representatives in Congress, and you yourselves, always insist on the policy of the Philippines for the Filipinos, and justice to the Filipinos, you are bound to make a success in those islands that cannot but reflect the greatest credit on the American nation. (Applause and cheers.)

“I am afraid I am taking up too much time—(Cries of ‘No, No; Go on, Go on.’) - Now, ladroneism will continue there for fifty years; the character of the country is such that we must expect it. Ladroneism is usually made up, after you get the professional criminals into jail, as we have succeeded generally in doing, are made up of mountaineers, are organized by an enterprising mountaineer who discovers some means of keeping a bullet out of his breast by what he calls an anting anting. He gathers about him some hundred or two of followers, to whom he sells anting antings, which they believe will ward off bullets. Then they settle down in a village, and in order to live, because these antings do not encourage labor, they prey upon their neighbors, and as the richer villages are in the bottoms they go down in the bottoms and take what they can get there. Every once in a while you will see that some constabulary was shot down or killed in a bolo rush by fanatics. Well, that is what a fanatic is. He is a mixture between a robber and a fakir. They have those gentlemen in the mountains, and we may expect constantly to be troubled by them until we get railroads to their homes, until we get roads through, so that we can reach the mountains as easily as we reach the plains. But I don’t think I state it too strongly when I say that ladroneism is less than it ever has been in the history of those islands, and that we shall gradually wipe it out.

“In the matter of health, the islands need a great deal. First, they need pure water; we should have driven wells in the villages. Then they need trained nurses to teach the women how to take care of their children. The loss of children under six months is frightful, and that is why we need the assistance of all the Protestant and all the Catholic denominations that we can get there; people who will come with a missionary spirit to do good and to teach those people how to live. They welcome such assistance; but, gentlemen, in organizing a government and carrying it on with limited means, it is impossible to have a model government all at once. A modern government is very expensive, and the money is not there, and we must hope to make these steps of progress only gradually.

“There are ports in the islands that we are constructing, and roads, and we have found a place in Benguet, 5,000 feet up, where the climate the year round, with the exception of two months when it is so wet that nobody can enjoy life there, is not unlike the climate of the Adirondacks, and there it is that we hope to put a summer capital; there it is that we hope to run an electric railway. We are engaged in constructing that road now. It will cost some twelve hundred thousand dollars to finish it, but when it is done it becomes entirely possible for Americans to live in the islands, adjourning for the two months to a very healthful region.

“The proper personnel of the government is very difficult to keep up. We had seventeen defalcations in disbursing officers and treasurers. That was about two per cent. of all disbursing officers and treasurers. It was a humiliation I cannot tell you the depth of, that we should be there trying to teach those people honest government, and then that those rascals should filch the money. It seemed to us that there was in their crime something more than dishonesty; it was treason to the government that was trying to build a decent government there. And as a consequence, and an illustration of the fact that we have a judicial system there that works, out of that seventeen, fifteen are now in Bilibid prison serving terms from ten to twenty-five years. (Applause.) One man who was not shown to have received the money himself, but who was charged under the Spanish laws with negligence in enabling his subordinates to steal the money, was acquitted on the ground that he was such an incompetent fool at any rate that he exercised all the diligence that could be expected from such an incompetent fool. It was not satisfactory to the government, but as he was acquitted, we let him go.

“Now, gentlemen, the question is asked me, Will it pay? I don't care whether it will pay or not; we are there; we have a burden upon us; and we have got to discharge it.

“Now, it is said that when the Democrats get in they are going to let these islands go. (A voice, ‘When is that?’) Well, I have not been in politics so long as to give a positive answer to that, but I think it will be at some remote time. But my own judgment is that the Democrats when they investigate the question carefully and reserve to themselves that time that they always reserve for the formation of a stable government, that you will find them pursuing the same policy that is being pursued to-day. That complete establishment of stable government that they are looking for will be postponed and postponed, because they will realize that the honor of the nation is involved in making that government really stable, and that after all we shall be aiming at the same thing.

“Now, I am asked another thing: Why is it that we should not say to these people, We are going to give you independence. Won't that make them happy, and won't that facilitate what we are trying to do there? I say no, with great emphasis. I don't care whether the Filipinos have independence or not. My own judgment is that if we deal generously with them, and develop the islands as we ought to develop them, and bring them into a close bond of union with these United States, that that union will be so mutually profitable that after it has been maintained for years neither party will wish to dissolve it. But what I wish to impress upon you, gentlemen, is this, that unless the present government is a success, all hope of a decent independent government is gone. And anything that interferes with the success of the present government is sure to interfere with the success of a possible independent government. Now, I don't care how you may word your declaration, if you say to those people, We are going to give you independence, you will have a delegation calling on you in the next three weeks to know whether that independence is coming in six months or a year. The demagogues and the gentlemen who are not in office, have very little interest in an independence that is to come in the next generation after they are dead. (Laughter.) Now, you cannot make a people over in one generation or in two; and anything that frightens the conservative element of that population upon whom you must depend for the success of your government, into thinking that they will in some way sacrifice themselves by being friends of the Americans when the more violent element comes into control with independence; you destroy your opportunity for making a good government by building up and increasing that conservative, self-restraining, possibly self-governing element in the people. (Applause.) I feel as if it is not too much to say that planks in a party platform with respect to the Philippines, from now on, except a plank that declares that it is the duty of the United States to do everything in its power to increase the prosperity and the happiness of the Filipino people, are a mistake. Let the present government go on and demonstrate if it can, as I believe it can, that it is upon the right track and is building up among the Filipino people a conservative set that know the necessity for self-restraint in a popular self government, and success lies before you.

“And now, gentlemen, I have talked much too long. I thank you sincerely for your kind attention. I should like to get into the heart and soul of each of you the intense interest that I feel in the success of this problem. I should like to have you make your representatives in Congress feel that their first duty is to attend to the Philippines, and when you have done that the problem is solved.” (Applause and cheers.)

President McCook then said: “After listening to the address of the Secretary of War you will all agree with me that no mistake was made when that cable was sent to Governor Taft in Manila. The cable message was followed by a letter sent to meet Governor Taft at Honolulu in which he was assured that if he would come to us he would find a sympathetic audience ready and anxious to listen; that he would both interest and instruct us and do some very good missionary work by enlightening the people of New York as to what he and our government had done for the Philippines.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“We are all very grateful to Secretary Taft for fulfilling this engagement when he had to speak to us under such adverse conditions as he has to-night.

“Our programme is a very short one. We are to have three brief addresses, which I am sure will be interesting.

“The first one will be on the American Navy, by the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives. Congressman Foss, like Admiral Dewey, is a Vermonter by birth, but he represents Illinois in Congress. The reason that he instead of some Ohio man was selected to come here to-night, is because he is the very best man to do what is expected of him. He has just demonstrated his remarkable powers as a Congressional naval commander by carrying through the House of Representatives a bill appropriating $97,000,000 for the American navy. For this we owe him a debt of gratitude. We will now listen to Mr. Foss.”

Mr. Foss said: “Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—I esteem it a great honor to be here this evening. I have met Ohioans at home, but I never met so many abroad. (Laughter.) And yet, as I look into your faces to-night, I do not see but what New York Ohioans are a good deal like those at home. They have the same characteristics, the same appetites and the same thirsts, only perhaps a little more highly developed. There is one thing about an Ohioan, wherever you find him, whether at home or abroad, he is loyal to his state. He feels a good deal like the Irishman who said that every man loves his native land, whether he was born there or not. You can say, also, with the poet, you New York Ohioans, ‘True patriots are we, for be it understood,

We left our country for our country’s good.’ (Laughter.)

“You belong to that greater Ohio, that Ohio which overruns the country, for where is it possible to go and not find an Ohioan, who in a quiet and modest way is trying to carve out his own fortune, and not infrequently his neighbor’s, too? We believe, out in Illinois, that there is not much chance for us until Ohio Buckeyes are well provided. Ohio, first in war (turning to General Chaffee), first in peace (turning to Secretary Taft), but first and last in public office. (Laughter and applause.)

“I am glad to be here to-night, at this banquet given in honor of your great Ohioan, Governor Taft. First of all, he is an Ohioan, but best of all he is an American. And while in a peculiar sense he belongs to your own state, yet in a truer and a larger sense he belongs to the whole country. (Applause.) And if you do not realize the true significance of that now, I think you will a little later on.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“I am glad to be here to-night, to represent in an imperfect way the American navy. Wherever the American army is, sir, there is the American navy. In every great crisis in our national history, the American navy and the American army have won the magnificent achievements which have been ours. It was so in the War of the American Revolution; it was so in the War of 1812; it was so in the Mexican War; it was so in the Civil War. The American navy has always supplemented upon the sea the work of the army on the land, and both together have accomplished these mighty results. No historian can ever write a history of the Civil War and leave out of it the bravery of the American sailor any more than he can write it and leave out the daring of the American soldier. Both together, inspired by a common devotion to a common flag preserved the union between North and South, which time is fast cementing into a peace, a perpetual peace, in the everlasting bonds of American brotherhood. And so it was, sir, in the Spanish-American War. The army and the navy gave us Manila and Santiago, those bright pages in American history.

“But after our Civil War we allowed our navy to go to pieces, and in 1881 we had very few pieces left. At the close of that war we had the largest navy on the globe, but in 1881 we ranked about twentieth among the navies of the world; and then began that policy of building up the American navy under the splendid administration of Chester A. Arthur. The first authorization of ships began under the secretaryship of Mr. Chandler. On March 3, 1883, Congress authorized the Atlanta, the Boston, the Chicago, and the Dolphin, sometimes called the A, B, C and D of the new navy. After Chandler came Whitney, who carried on the splendid work. Under Whitney were authorized our first two battleships, the unfortunate Maine, and the Texas. After Whitney came Tracy, and under him we authorized our first-class battleships, the Iowa, the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the famous Oregon. After Tracy came Herbert, and after Herbert came Long, and after Long came our present able and efficient secretary, William H. Moody. The country is to be congratulated in always having at the head of that great department men of great foresight and character who have seen the necessity of building up our navy upon the sea. To-day we have built and building 24 battleships, 12 ironclads, 10 armored cruisers, 49 protected and unprotected cruisers, 16 torpedo boat destroyers, 34 torpedo boats, and 8 submarines; and if all the nations of the world stopped now, when these ships are completed we would rank third among the navies of the world; Great Britain first, France second.

“Now, I may say that while we have not the largest navy in the world, yet man for man and ship for ship I believe we have the most efficient navy on the globe. (Applause and cheers.) Some people are saying, Let us stop building up the navy; but those people who are for a little navy, are also crying for a little nation and a little people. And if war should come they would interpose the Golden Rule against the 12-inch guns of the antagonist.

“ Sir, I deprecate war, and should be glad to see the time come when the war drums will beat no longer and the battle flags be furled; but I realize that mankind has not reached its millennium yet, and hence I believe in the policy of building up the American navy. Your chairman has alluded to the fact that recently the House of Representatives passed a bill carrying $97,000,000. It did; and yet that is but a little more than one dollar for every man, woman and child in the country; it is but four per cent. of our foreign trade and commerce; it is about 17 per cent. of our total government expenses; a less percentage to the whole than our forefathers spent more than one hundred years ago upon the navy; and as compared with our national wealth it is only one-tenth of one per cent.—very cheap insurance, indeed, for a great country like ours.

“ There is one thing you must bear in mind, in regard to a navy, you must build it in time of peace. There is this distinction between an army and a navy: an army is made up largely of personnel, and when war comes you can call into the field men from every walk of life; they come from the field and the farm, from the workshop and the office, and in a short time they can be trained and disciplined into good soldiers, ready to march to the front, and when the war is over they go back to their homes and are lost in the citizenship of the land. But, not so with the navy, because the navy is made up not only of personnel but also largely of material. It takes years to build a battleship or a cruiser, and it takes longer to train sailors than to train soldiers; and by reason of this fact you must build the navy in time of peace, because when war comes then every man must be upon his ship and every man at his gun.

“ It is not necessary, I think, to an audience like this, to preach very much upon the necessity of building up a navy. You are pretty near the coast line. But we should let this be our sentiment: The American Navy; ever ready for war; but may it never be required to fire a single shot. Let us build the navy, because we have interests to protect on this hemisphere as well as on the other; we have a coast line to protect; we must guard the Panama canal. And, sir, we have a President in the White House who proposes to build it. We must maintain the Monroe Doctrine, which a colleague of mine said the other day was no bigger than your navy; we must protect our commerce wherever that commerce goes; we must protect the Filipinos whom to-day we are raising up out of the bondage of superstition and ignorance into the clear bright sky of American civilization. We must back up our foreign policy, which was never so strong and respected among the nations of the world as it is at this hour under John Hay. (Applause and cheers.)

“We must build this navy for peace; that kind of peace that is honorable among men and approved by God; that kind of peace that never makes surrender of national honor, of national duty, or national obligation. And so I say to you to-night, let us build it conservatively, not moved by the passion of the hour, but build it with a fixed determination to always give our country a military arm upon the sea strong enough so that in every hour of international complication she can always maintain that poise and that calmness which becometh a great nation and a great people, slow to anger, and plentiful in mercy; but when she strikes may she ever strike as Dewey struck at Manila, for honor, for justice, for truth, for civilization, for righteousness, and for ‘that perfect liberty of mankind’ which under God is the great and glorious mission of our America.” (Applause and cheers.)

President McCook said: “We are all convinced that the Congressional interests of the American navy are safe in the hands of such a chairman as has spoken to us to-night. (Applause.) It is significant that Mr. Foss does not come from the danger line on the Atlantic or Pacific seaboard, where in case of war we are likely to hear from the other fellow’s navy. He comes from that great but nautically safe metropolitan city of Chicago. For this reason we are all the more grateful to Mr. Foss for taking such good care of our naval interests.

“We will now have the pleasure of listening to a few words on a subject that is new to many of us, the Sons of Ohio. With our accustomed modesty, we usually go a little without the state for a man to speak upon this subject. At times there is confusion as to where the border line between Ohio and Indiana runs, so that some of the statesmen out there have to think twice before they are quite certain as to which of the two states they represent. One of our political poets once said, ‘I care not who writes the people’s songs, so long as Ohio furnishes the governors, senators and congressmen for all the adjoining states.’ (Laughter.)

“Both senators from Indiana were born in Ohio, and the gentleman who will address us, representing the old Colfax constituency in Indiana, was also born in our native state.

“We will now hear from Hon. Charles B. Landis, representative in Congress from Indiana.” (Applause.)

Mr. Landis said: “I am what might be called, perhaps, a hyphenated American citizen. I am an Ohio-Indianian, a Hoosier-Buckeye. I remained in Ohio, where I was born, until I was seventeen years of age, and in all those years being neither elected to Congress nor made governor of the commonwealth, I decided that it was a reckless waste of precious time, and I turned my back on the fertile valley of the Miami and my face toward the rich valley of the Wabash—where ‘the candle lights are gleaming—on the banks of the Wabash, far away.’

“Indiana and Ohio, sister states, daughters of the ordinance of 1787, united by bonds of kinship, reverencing the same memories, inspired and guided by the same instincts. But for the mark set by the surveyor, it were impossible to tell where Ohio ceases and Indiana begins. The line is simply imaginary, Ohio is but a child of older and stronger growth. I have taught my children to reverence their father’s state. Reading some time ago to my little boy of the voyage of Columbus and the discovery of America, he interrupted me by asking if Christopher Columbus was born in Ohio, I told him he was not, and he then asked why it was that we named the capital of the state after him. I extricated myself from embarrassment by explaining to him that it was to commemorate the fact that there was one great achievement in human history in which an Ohioan was not an active participant. (Laughter and applause.)

“Ohio was fitted by nature to be the nursery of great men. Great hills, great valleys, great forests, great rivers, her conformation rugged, rolling and level, her climate one continuous inspiration to endeavor and to ambition. Washington visited the state when a young man, was greatly impressed by its beauty and its wealth, and when asked, after the Revolution, what he would have done had the cause of the colonists failed, he replied that he would have gathered together the remnants of his struggling bands, would have led them over the Alleghanies, and in the valley of the Ohio they would have settled and there lived in peace, in security, and in happiness forever. Thus you see how narrow an escape Washington had from being a son of Ohio. But some things are necessary besides climate and soil to make great men and women. There must be blood, good blood, and Ohio got it. Revolutionary fathers and mothers, their minds strengthened and enlarged by the struggle for independence and by the solution of those problems incident to the adoption of the constitution, they came to Ohio, led by grand old Rufus Putnam. In one hand they carried the Bible and in the other the school book, and in their hearts was a consecration to human liberty and to the inviolable will of God. Europe’s best faith and hope settled New England, and New York, and Pennsylvania, and Virginia; and the flower of that manhood and womanhood went to Ohio and gave us the foundation for her greatness and her character. And those people builded a state; yes, they builded a state, a state that boasts enough pride, enough achievements, enough glory to stock twenty ordinary nations for a hundred years, instead of but one little state for a century and a little over. A great and glorious state, Ohio. God was good to Ohio. You ask me where are her sons? Rather should you ask me where are they not. They are in every state and territory in this Union, and in the islands of the sea. Some one has said that the Maine was blown up in the harbor of Havana, and that Ohio men came down all over the world. Two millions of Ohio's sons settled in other states. There are nine sons of Ohio to-day in the United States senate; thirty-two of them in the national house of representatives; two of them in the cabinet of the President, an array of greatness recognized throughout the length and breadth of the land. And here in the metropolis of the Republic, if you gathered about these boards are a sample of Ohio in New York, how lonesome Father Knickerbocker would be without you! And how lonesome my beloved state of Indiana would have been in the years gone by, without Ohio, and would be to-day! Our first railroad was built by John Brough of Ohio. Thomas A. Hendricks, Vice-President of the United States, a grand and gifted man; he was a son of Ohio. Daniel W. Voorhees, eloquent and generous, on the platform magnificent, he was a son of Ohio. Joseph E. McDonald, true and loyal, a senator of the United States of distinction, he was a son of Ohio. Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, pure and great, and his administration ideal (applause), Benjamin Harrison was a son of Ohio. And our two United States senators, Charles W. Fairbanks and Albert J. Beveridge, the former it seems to be nominated for Vice-President of the United States by unanimous consent, they, too, are sons of Ohio. Oh, how lonesome Indiana would be without Ohio! How lonesome the states and territories of this union would be without Ohio!

“It is not my purpose, and I haven't time, to review all of the achievements in the various avenues of human endeavor of the sons of Ohio. It would require a volume, it would require a year's time. I will content myself with giving some little attention to those who have come upon the scene of action since I became a citizen of Ohio forty-five years ago. Gen. William H. Harrison, President of the United States, hero of Tippecanoe—he was a son of Ohio. And in 1860, when Lincoln was given the choice between courage or cowardice, war with the preservation of the Union or peace without that Union, he choose the former and recognized that two things were all important, a currency and an army; and the currency he turned over to Salmon P. Chase and the army to Edwin M. Stanton, and both were sons of Ohio. A committee representing the house and the senate on the conduct of the war had to be appointed, and it had to have a head. That head, as chairman, was bluff old Ben Wade, and he was a son of Ohio. At first reverses came, darkness invaded the land, we needed some one to lead our armies. A plain simple man who had never traveled with a brass band accompaniment was given rather an unimportant command, but he climbed and he climbed, and at last Donelson fell, and the first great victory for the Union was won, and the name of the world's greatest captain was on the lips of millions of men, and he remained at the head of the army until Appomattox. He was a son of Ohio, and his name was Grant. (Applause.) He had two great helpers, both his right hand, you might say. One was William Tecumseh Sherman, and the other was Phil Sheridan, and they were sons of Ohio.

“The war over, twenty sons of Ohio came out of that conflict wearing the epaulets of a major-general; twenty-seven of them brevetted major-general. In addition to the great triumvirate of Grant, Sherman and Sheridan, there was McClellan, MacPherson, Rosecranz, Steedman, three McCooks, McDowell, Schenck, Buell, James A. Garfield, Cox, Custer and a score of others whose names are synonymous with daring and victory, all of them from Ohio. There was one family in the state of Ohio that gave to the North in that rebellion a father and nine sons. One of them came out a major-general, three of them as brigadier-generals, and they were known as the ‘Fighting McCooks.’ (Applause and cheers.) The only surviving member of that branch of the family honors this board to-night—sits at the head of this table and presides at this banquet. Another branch of that same McCook family gave five brothers to the naval and military service, all of them distinguished, two becoming general officers. Every President of the United States elected to that office since Abraham Lincoln, except one, was a son of Ohio. That state gave to the supreme bench of the United States five members, two of whom occupied the place of chief justice. And when it became necessary to bring about a condition of peace in the Philippines, to capture Aguinaldo, to trace him to his lair and throttle him, it was done by Fred Funston, and he was a son of Ohio. And when American citizens were cooped up in Peking, beleaguered, and we were anxious to the point of hysteria, the American army marched to the capital of that great empire and planted the American flag upon its battlements. And at the head of that army was Chaffee, who is with us to-night, and he was a son of Ohio.

“Joseph Benson Foraker is a son of Ohio. And his name will be identified for all time with the insular legislation that has been written on the statute books of this Republic during the last seven years.

“William McKinley was a son of Ohio. (Applause.) Forty years ago a poor boy in a little country town in northern Ohio; his mother kept boarders and his elder sister worked and saved to assist in his education. For four decades he wrought, and when we laid him away business was hushed in every land that civilization lights; the electric current was dead around the world; rapid flying trains and steamships paused in their course; noblemen and peasants stood in tears; he was the greatest, gentlest captain of his time. Rich in saving common sense and, as the greatest always are, in his simplicity sublime. Oh, how he wrought for the Republic; oh, his deportment in the Eastern sea when the crisis came! In 1860 a poor boy in a little country town in northern Ohio; forty years later the gentle yet majestic character of all Christendom, teaching the world a lesson in international equity, and dictating terms to monarchs in whose veins flowed the blood of centuries of kings. If Ohio had no other possession of which to boast than that, she would be rich indeed.

“Mark Hanna was a son of Ohio. (Applause.) Abused and misrepresented, but finally vindicated. During those hours of his sickness a nation in tears stood by his bedside. Calumny ran to the mountains and hid and detraction and defamation asked for an opportunity to apologize. I recently saw a tribute paid by a caricaturist who pursued him through his political life, in which he said that Senator Hanna’s character had demonstrated that no honest man need fear a cartoon. When I saw that I thought of a similar tribute paid when Lincoln fell. London Punch had pursued him mercilessly throughout the terrible ordeal of civil war; but that awful tragedy seemed to shock that caricaturist into a condition of sanity and good sense, and he confessed his error against Lincoln in these words:

“You, lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln’s bier,
You, who with mocking pencil went to trace
Broad for the self-complacent British sneer,
His length of shambling limb, his furrowed face.
His gaunt, gnarled hands, his unkempt bristling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair,
Of power or will to shine, of art to please.
You, whose smart pen backed up the pencil’s laugh,
Judging each step as though the way were plain;
Reckless, so it could point a paragraph,
Of chief’s perplexity, or people’s pain.
Beside that corpse, that bears for winding sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurril jester, is there room for you?
Yes; he lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil and confute my pen,
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This railsplitter a true born king of men.’

“So it was with Mark Hanna, but we have consolation in the fact that he lived to know the victory he had won, and to be recognized by the whole world as ‘a true born king of men.’ (Applause.)

“A New York man sits in the White House, but there are two Ohioans who are members of his cabinet, John Hay and William Howard Taft. John Hay; his name will be forever associated with the progressive and practical diplomacy which marks the birth of the twentieth century. His patience, his calm deportment, his rare good sense, have made the American Republic the great umpire of Christendom. He says he will not meddle in the domestic affairs of other nations, but we will insist on an open door in the Far East, and upon a strict compliance with all treaty stipulations, and upon our rights in foreign harbors. And the haste with which the nations of the world ratified his note to the powers was at once a tribute to his sagacity and to the potentiality of the American Republic among the nations of the world.

“And William H. Taft, the secretary of war. He succeeded a splendid citizen and an ideal American, Elihu Root, of New York. A man whose administration touched high tide every hour he sat in that chair. War took the banner to the Philippine Islands, but the splendid trophies of peace are all about it to-day; and the most beautiful victory won by Columbia in the last century, in my judgment, has been won over there in that archipelago, and the name of Taft is written all over it. (Applause.)

“I must not detain you longer, but if I can say one thing in conclusion it would be this: That the most beautiful thing about the sons of Ohio is that they can make love of their state secondary to love of their country. Country first, and state afterwards. I am reminded of an incident that occurred a year ago last May. I was invited down into Butler county, Ohio, to deliver the Decoration Day address. A man came to me, carefully unwrapped a newspaper, and handed me a letter saying that I would probably like to read it. It was old and worn; the envelope bore the postmark of Murfreesboro, dated, as I remember, 1863. I recognized in the handwriting the tracings of the pen made by my own father, and I read the letter. It was to my uncle Jacob, and told him of the death of a son, Simon, which had occurred on the battlefield the day before. He told my uncle how his boy had died; and he said to him, ‘This is the third son that you have given a sacrifice to your country.’ Said he, ‘This will be a terrible shock to you, but in the hour of your affliction you have this consolation: Simon and his brothers died fighting for the best government upon which the sun has ever shone.’ That was a tribute from the battlefield; that was the consolation that kinship offered to grief. ‘The greatest country upon which the sun has ever shone!’ It was true then, it is true now, and it has been true every hour since Independence Hall! We love Ohio, but better still we love our country, the best country upon which the sun has ever shone.” (Applause.)

President McCook said: “On one of the panels in the ante-room of the secretary of war at Washington are four portraits. One of Stanton, the great war secretary of Lincoln’s cabinet, while grouped about him are the portraits of Grant, Sherman and Sheridan, the chief commanders of our armies at the close of the Civil War, and all four of them sons of Ohio.

“A similar condition exists in these piping times of peace. Taft, from Ohio, is secretary of war. Chaffee, from Ohio, is the lieutenant general, and Corbin, from Ohio, is the senior major-general of our army. They are all guests of honor at our table to-night, and right proud are we of this Buckeye triumvirate, who, like their splendid predecessors, while exercising military authority, do so as the servants of the people and as the patriotic exponents of liberty under the law. After listening for a few moments to Governor Herrick, I am going to ask Lieutenant-General Chaffee, the chief of the general staff, and Major-General Corbin, commanding the division of the East, the senior officers of the American army, and Rear-Admiral Watson, the senior-rear-admiral on the active list of the navy, to stand up and let us look at them, while we give them a hearty and enthusiastic cheer of greeting.

“ We will now hear a word from the governor of our own state, who was called to that office by the largest majority ever given to an Ohio man in public life. It gives me much pleasure to introduce the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, Governor of Ohio.” (Applause and cheers.)

Governor Herrick said: “ Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the Ohio Society: A little girl in Butte, Montana, once wrote to Longfellow, ‘ You are my poet; the greatest poet, and I love your poetry, and I want to ask you how it can be that so great a poet can live so far away from Butte.’ Perhaps those of us who reside in Ohio have the little girl’s point of view.

“ I know something of the allurements of New York, and of the delights of Indiana and of Illinois; I have heard of the pleasures of Washington; but I cannot understand why it is that these gentlemen, so many of whom I see before me here to-night, are willing to leave their old state—their native state of Ohio—and go elsewhere to seek their fortunes. But while they seem willing to occupy the soil of other states, the love for the old home remains with them.

“ Mr. Landis has called the roll of the nation’s leaders in naming Ohio men. It is true that Waterloo was won at Eton and Harrow; then it is equally true that every momentous question that has been settled in this Republic in the last forty years was settled in the public schools of Ohio. The past we know; the roll has been called of Ohio men, and I am glad to have it called by a man outside of our state, because I do not wish to-night, in a boastful spirit, to speak of our men. We have splendid men at home, and we send splendid men abroad. We have supplied the nation, and we are raising boys in the public schools to supply it in the years to come. (Laughter and applause.) We have so many great men in Ohio, waiting for the call of the nation, that they sometimes even jostle each other within the borders of the state. (Laughter and applause.)

“ The past is behind us, and the history of Ohio and its importance in the nation has been so well told by Mr. Landis that I need not dwell upon it; but it is of the future that I would speak. Virginia in her day occupied the position in this nation that is now and has been for the past forty years held by Ohio. The glories of Virginia are those of the setting sun; those of Ohio are of the rising sun, and the sun is just over the yard arm. New conditions are arising in our nation, conditions which the citizens of every state must take heed. In the early settlement of this country, especially the early settlement of the East, the pioneer labored over the mountains with his ox team and hewed out of the forest a home. It was then the farm first, the village next, and then the railway. The West has not been settled that way. This was truly the basis for a solid and conservative citizenship, but the great West has not been settled in that way; it has been the railway first, the village next and the farm last. And this domain has been rapidly filling. It is this which has been bringing to us these new conditions. If we stop for a moment to think that beyond the Mississippi River are 1,830,000 square miles of arable land; on this side of the Mississippi River are only 800,000 square miles, and the country is rapidly filling. The sceptre may soon depart from Ohio. Congress and senate—the country—is eventually to be controlled by the dominant West that is so rapidly coming to the front. And those conditions which confront us to-day in this country are the result of the rapid settlement of the West and the taking up of the tillable lands.

“Macaulay made a prophecy so far back as 1857 relating to this condition, which comes home to us with tremendous force to-day. He wrote a friend in 1857 in this country: ‘Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. As long as you have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land, your laboring population will be far more at ease than the laboring population of the old world. But the time will come when New England will be so thickly peopled as old England. Wages will be as low and will fluctuate as much with you as with us, and in those Manchesters and Birminghams hundreds and thousands of artisans will assuredly be sometimes out of work. Through such scenes the United States will have to pass in the course of the next century if not in this. I wish you a good deliverance, but my reason and my wishes are at war, and I cannot help foreboding the worst.’

“Garfield said of this in later years: ‘When I read Macaulay’s statement it startled me like an alarm bell in the night.’

“We have our Manchesters and our Birminghams to-day in this country, and the conditions so clearly foretold by Macaulay seem to be gradually approaching us, if they are not already here. What the great Englishman beheld has made an American discern in the mists of the future the different causes and effects, and led him to make a mental picture; but Mark Hanna’s vision was none the less clear and penetrating. What man cannot be flattered? But it is to the eternal glory of our departed friend’s memory that he not only knew this condition, but had the courage to meet it open handed and to boldly undertake its solution. What a loss to the country! What a loss this country suffered in his taking off! Years ago he realized that the harmonious relations of capital and labor was the most vital question, the all-involving problem of the hour. He felt that until that was settled there could never be any lasting peace in the land, nor any enduring security in conditions. Hanna, while of very tender sentiment, was no idealist. He had seen theory after theory fail without benefit to either side. What was needed was practical common sense and openness of action, above all honesty. In his rugged fashion he said to the master: 'You are lacking in this respect.' He said to the laborer: 'Your demands are unjust; modify them.' Each instinctively recognized the justice of the reproof, and felt that here was an unselfish friend to whom it was best to listen. 'You think your rights are invaded,' he said to the millionaire master of a thousand discontented workmen. 'It is your dignity, your pride, that is offended. It is your pride that is keeping you from your plain and manifest duty.' The great man heard the reproof, and pondered over it. There was a struggle, but the innate justice conquered, and the strike was averted.

"Like our honored friend and counsellor, we must be honest with the world and with ourselves. There must be no surrender of principles in dealing with this question. We met it fairly in Ohio last year, and the unerring judgment of the people was with us, was in our favor. Let us have no more hypocrisy, no more sycophancy, or demagoguery. Let us say to capital: 'You must not in the face of public sentiment insist upon the dictation and control of legislation, and above all you must respect human rights.' To labor let us say: 'You must not seek to legislate in advance of public sentiment, and you must respect the same rights of property, and you must also respect human rights.' To them that are in authority let us say: 'Cease pandering to emotion, and make your purposes honest; heed not public clamor or the mouthings of the demagogue, but be ever mindful of the great heart of the people speaking the message of truth. Rely on the people. They are honest, they are just, and they are grateful, and they love justice and hate iniquity.'

"McKinley said to you here in this room in 1900: 'A self-governed people will never permit despotism in any government which they foster and defend.' 'Because they loved him so,' was the answer to the question why capitalist and wage earner wept over him whom we mourn. Why did the people love Mark Hanna, we ask, and they answer: 'Because he was honest, because he was just in all his dealings with them, because he tried to be right for right's sake, and because he despised hypocrisy and loved frankness.' What a mighty lesson in statesmanship it was. A help and example, it has taught us something we should never forget, but keep ever before us as we urge the solution of the problem which these conditions have been steadily forcing to the front, that the man who dares to be right will ultimately be vindicated by a justice-loving American people." (Applause.)

President McCook said: "Before declaring the adjournment of the eighteenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York, I will ask the senior representatives of our army and navy, Rear-Admiral Watson, the man who, as his flag lieutenant, lashed Farragut to the rigging of the flagship Hartford at the battle of Mobile Bay, and Lieutenant-General Chaffee and Major-General Corbin to stand up and receive our cordial salutations."

(These guests arose, as requested.)

Hon. Charles B. Landis said: "I propose three cheers, three buckeye cheers for Generals Chaffee and Corbin and Admiral Watson."

When the distinguished military and naval guests stood in their places at the president's table, the members of the Society and their guests, amid a spontaneous outburst of applause, rose to their feet and gave three hearty and enthusiastic cheers for the distinguished soldiers and sailor who bowed their acknowledgments of the honor done them.

President McCook said: "This meeting stands adjourned."

CHAPTER XXI

A PLEASANT meeting was that of the Society on April 10th, on the occasion of a reception to Ohioans in New York who were eligible to membership. There was a gratifying attendance. President McCook greeted the assembled guests, stating the desirability of membership in the Ohio Society; that it was increasing rapidly, the number of resident members being 318; non-resident, 215; total, 533, not including those elected to-night, of which there were 28, making the total membership of the Society to date 561, the largest ever enjoyed.

A vote of thanks was tendered to Mr. Parsons for his presentation to the Society of a portrait of General Chaffee and of Col. E. L. Drake. Thanks were tendered to President McCook for his presentation of a portrait of Secretary of War Taft. A vote of thanks was tendered to Mr. Hawk, of the Manhattan Hotel, for the entertainment of the guests at the annual banquet.

Mr. Southard moved that Secretary Taft be made an honorary member of this Society. Carried, and laid over for one month, as required by the by-laws. He was subsequently elected.

After the adjournment the members and guests enjoyed an excellent programme prepared by the entertainment committee, consisting of vocal and instrumental music by various artists, closing with a wonderful exhibition of card tricks of all kinds by Mr. Arnold. Refreshments were then served.

At the meeting of May 9th the chair called on Mr. Hoyt to give an account of the very interesting and remarkable dinner of the Canton Society, which Mr. Hoyt and President McCook had attended on the Saturday night previous, Judge Day, of Canton, being the guest of honor. Mr. Hoyt thereupon gave a very interesting account, expressing the thought that the Canton Society was a good field for the Ohio Society to cultivate for new members.

On June 13th the report of the committee appointed to prepare resolutions in honor of the memory of the late Senator Marcus A. Hanna was presented. The record of these resolutions upon the minute book of the Society is specially honored in one respect, that the signatures attached are the original autographs of the prominent sons of Ohio whose names appear upon the list. One of these gentlemen has served as governor of Ohio, another as United States senator from Ohio, and still another as president of the Ohio Society of New York. The memorial was as follows:

“The unique and brilliant career of M. A. Hanna entitles him to a place among the great Americans. He was a great business man; a great political leader; a great statesman; a great orator; and a great philanthropist. He won conspicuous triumphs in more diversified fields of endeavor than any other American.

“Until he was past fifty, he devoted himself to business. His integrity, his courage, his energy, his sagacity and his power not only to plan, but to execute, made him indeed widely known and respected, but only as a business man. He then turned his attention to national politics. He believed that William McKinley was the fittest standard bearer of his party. With a determination characteristically inflexible, and a friendship characteristically loyal, he set about the task of procuring the nomination of the great Ohioan. No obstacle could stop him. Nothing could either change or weaken his purpose. The defeat of 1892 did not daunt him. The fact that most of the political leaders of national reputation were either doubtful of the expediency or possibility of the nomination, or were openly opposed to it, neither shook his faith nor quenched his courage.

“It is indeed true, that had the beloved and lamented McKinley been other than he was, even Hanna could not have accomplished the result which proved so beneficent to the country; but it is also true, that if Hanna had not been what he was; loyal, able, inexorable, untiring, sagacious, and above all, masterful, the country might have lost an administration, which not only added glorious pages to its history, but inaugurated policies which must endure, because they promote not only the prosperity of Americans, but the welfare of mankind.

“When the nomination was made, Mr. Hanna, who had then convinced people how strong he was, and how wise he was, was fittingly selected to lead the Republican hosts in the field. His conduct of that critical campaign was what might have been expected from him; it was masterly. And, when the ballots were counted and the victory for good government and for sound money was assured, M. A. Hanna, hitherto well known only as a business man, was recognized as the foremost political leader of the time.

“He then went to the senate of the United States. Neither his education nor experience had apparently fitted him to excel in that distinguished body. He had had no training in the craft of statesmanship. He could not clothe his thoughts in the silken sentences of the phrase-maker; but to everybody’s surprise he took front rank among his colleagues. He became one of the leaders of the senate, not only in committee work, but on the floor, and his speech in favor of the Panama route, which changed deliberate conclusions previously reached, and his persistent and intelligent efforts to restore the American merchant marine, made him known, and widely known, as a statesman.

“ Shortly after his appointment to the senate, he was elected to that body by a bare majority; but, six years later, he was reelected by the largest vote ever given to a United States senator in the legislature of Ohio. And why was this? The chief reason was that in the meantime, this many-sided man had not only gained the respect and confidence, and won the admiration and affection of his countrymen by what he had done, but he had become an orator. The hand of his indomitable energy had placed another shining jewel in the crown of his accomplishment.

“ His campaign of 1903 was memorable, not only because of the thousands who thronged to hear him, but because of the thousands who were convinced by his plain, clear logic and his rugged eloquence.

“ But business and politics and statesmanship and oratory could not exhaust his energy or limit his endeavor. No task was too burdensome for him to undertake, or too difficult for him to successfully accomplish. He possessed a heart as gentle and generous as his mind was strong and sagacious. He gave not only his money, but himself, to charity and to philanthropic purpose. He sought to conciliate and bring into harmony capital and labor. He himself belonged to one class, but he held out his hand to the other, and he became the trusted representative of both. As was well said of him in eulogy: ‘He was not only a President-maker, but a Peace-maker.’ His intelligence excited the admiration of his fellows, but his kindness touched their hearts.

“ It is fitting that this Society, of which he was so many years a member, and the members of which loved him not only for what he had done for his country and for Ohio, for his prestige, his prominence and his accomplishments, but loved him for his cordial handclasp and his genial, kindly smile—it is fitting that this Society should spread upon its minutes a tribute to his worth, and that in token of their sincere and respectful sympathy with his wife and family, a copy of this resolution should be sent to them.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

In the October meeting the following gentlemen were named as a committee on nominations of officers: H. H. Sisson, H. H. Brockway, C. D. Hilles, Warren Higley, L. D. Morrison, L. H. Crall, John M. Chandler. In the meeting of November 14th, Mr. Crall, as chairman of the nominating committee, reported the ticket for officers for the coming year, to be elected at the annual meeting of November 29, 1904. The report was as follows:

“In its work of nominating a ticket for the coming year, your committee has held three full meetings, besides numerous consultations. For president there was but one thought, and quoting the language of one of the members of the committee, ‘It goes without saying, Colonel McCook forever!’

“For vice-presidents, the committee presents representative men of the Society, of much experience, who are largely in affairs, and of known standing in this city, Mr. Thomas Ewing, Jr., Mr. John D. Archbold, Mr. Flamen Ball Candler, Mr. Eben B. Thomas and Mr. Emerson McMillin.

“Our present efficient secretary, Mr. Francis M. Applegate, has consented to serve another term, and we therefore present his name for reëlection to the office of secretary of the Society.

“There is a vacancy in the office of recording secretary, made by the recent death of the incumbent, Mr. Charles Morris, and we have had some difficulty in selecting a member who is willing to give the necessary time to this work. By virtue of his office, the recording secretary is a member of the board of governors. It is a very responsible position, and upon this officer the smooth running of the business of the board of governors, as well as of the Society, largely depends. The committee is most fortunate in securing its acceptance by a gentleman most admirably qualified to fill the position, Mr. Seth Thayer Stewart, who is district superintendent of the New York schools, and for many years was corresponding secretary of the Union League Club of Brooklyn.

“In the opinion of the committee one most important and exacting office of the Society is that of treasurer. The present efficient treasurer positively refused the nomination. In fact, some months ago, giving as his reasons that he could not afford the time necessary for the performance of the duties of this office, he presented his resignation to the board of governors, and consented to serve out his term only under strong pressure. Several members who could fill the office most acceptably were sounded, but declined to accept the nomination. A suggestion was made by one of the members of the committee which met with hearty approval, to nominate for treasurer one of the best known and most popular members of the Society. Unfortunately, this gentleman was a member of our committee; worse still, he was our chairman, and that fact placed him in a delicate and embarrassing position. It required all our powers of persuasion to prevail upon him to accept the nomination. He was one of the founders of our Society, and during the eighteen years of its existence, has taken an active interest in its affairs; he has served upon more committees than any other member, has been a member and chairman of the board of governors, a vice-president, and it is only because of his love for and loyalty to the Society that he has consented to assume the onerous and exacting duties of the office. The members of the committee are more than gratified to nominate as treasurer of the Society, Hon. Warren Higley.

“Three of the nine trustees retire from the board annually. It is wise that the trustees be men of marked business ability, and that they be thoroughly familiar with the Society’s affairs, as they, together with the president, recording secretary, and treasurer constitute the board of governors. The committee nominate three members for trustees who fully meet these requirements, Mr. H. B. Brundrett, one of our earliest members, Mr. Albert F. Hagar, our secretary for several years, and our retiring treasurer, Mr. Samuel H. Parsons.”

Recapitulating, the ticket reported was as follows: President: John J. McCook; Vice-presidents: Thomas Ewing, Jr., Flamen Ball Candler, John D. Archbold, Eben B. Thomas, Emerson McMillin; Secretary: Francis M. Applegate; Recording secretary: Seth Thayer Stewart; Treasurer: Warren Higley; Trustees: H. B. Brundrett, Albert F. Hagar, Samuel H. Parsons.

On the evening of November 14th, Orrel A. Parker, Esq., a member, delivered before the Society a most admirable address on Porto Rico, illustrated by stereopticon views. A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Parker for the entertainment.

The annual meeting of 1904 was held on November 29th, and took the form of a most excellent dinner at the Hotel Manhattan, with President McCook in the chair. The following gentlemen sat at the president’s table: Col. John J. McCook, Colgate Hoyt, Leander H. Crall, H. B. Brundrett, Gen. Henry L. Burnett, Chancellor MacCracken, David Homer Bates, John T. Granger, Hon. Milton I. Southard, George Follett, Louis D. Clarke, Ernest E. Baldwin.

The reports of the various officers and committees were presented, that of the governing committee being as follows:

“At its first meeting the committee was organized by the selection of Flamen B. Candler as its chairman. Therefrom the following house committee was appointed: Andrew J. C. Foyé, chairman; Leonard D. Morrison and Norman C. Raff.

“In accordance with the recommendation of Mr. Candler, it was ordered that the president appoint a committee of three members to consider whether the by-laws of the Society do or do not require alteration and amendment.

Warren Higley

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The following were appointed: Leander H. Crall, H. L. Burnett, Andrew J. C. Foyé."

Treasurer Parsons presented his third annual report, showing that the finances of the Society were in excellent condition, with a balance of $18,537.08.

The secretary was instructed to cast one ballot for the ticket proposed at the last meeting, and those gentlemen were declared unanimously elected.

The Society then had the pleasure of listening to short addresses from Colonel McCook, Chancellor MacCracken, Colgate Hoyt, Hon. Milton I. Southard and Gen. H. L. Burnett.

The governing committee met immediately after the adjournment of the meeting of the Society. President McCook announced that Mr. Stewart, the newly-elected secretary, would record the proceedings of the meetings, as secretary of the governing committee. Andrew Ernest Foyé was unanimously elected chairman of the committee. It was decided that the treasurer give a bond in the sum of $10,000, and that the expense of arranging for the bond with the surety company be borne by the Society. The committee again met on the evening of December 8th at the Hotel Astor, as the guests of Leander H. Crall, at an informal dinner. The following gentlemen were unanimously elected as a house committee: Andrew J. C. Foyé, chairman; Leonard D. Morrison and Norman C. Raff.

Mr. Crall moved that a committee of three be appointed to confer with the entertainment committee, the house committee and the membership committee, as to the policy to be adopted for the fiscal year in providing entertainment for the regular monthly meetings. The motion was adopted, and the following gentlemen named as that committee: A. E. Foyé, A. F. Hagar and Warner Ells.

The December meeting of the Society was held on the evening of the 12th, with Vice-President Ewing in the chair. Judge Higley moved that the Society have an annual banquet at such time during the winter as might be decided upon, and that the president be authorized to appoint a banquet committee. It was so ordered.

A communication was received from President McCook announcing the standing committees, and historian and chaplain, to serve during the coming year as follows: Literature and art: Albert Shaw, Robert Johnstone Mooney, Edward J. Wheeler, Howard Chandler Christy, Cass Gilbert; entertainment: Orrel A. Parker, Francis X. Butler, Sturges S. Dunham, Roland Hazen, Milton P. Jackson; auditing: Edward H. Childs, David Homer Bates, A. S. Gorham, S. Frederick Taylor, J. M. Chandler; library: Winchester Fitch, P. Tecumseh Sherman, V. Clement Jenkins, Frederic L. Matthews, E. F. Baldwin; membership: Charles D. Hilles, Colgate Hoyt, James G. Newcomb, Emory

A. Stedman, L. C. Ruch; historian: James H. Kennedy; chaplain: Rt. Rev. William A. Leonard, LL.D.

At a meeting of the governing committee on January 9, 1905, the treasurer was authorized to have one thousand year books printed. At the meeting of the Society on the same evening, Charles D. Hilles reported a series of resolutions in honor of the memory of Hon. George K. Nash, a former governor of Ohio. They were adopted, and it was ordered that an engrossed copy be sent to the family of the deceased. The president announced the following gentlemen as a committee for the annual banquet, to be held on the evening of Saturday, March 18, 1905: Colgate Hoyt, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, Milton I. Southard, Whitelaw Reid, Eben B. Thomas, John D. Archbold, William H. Truesdale, J. G. Schmidlapp, Tod B. Galloway, Nicholas Monsarrat, James G. Newcomb, Samuel H. Parsons, Emerson McMillin, William L. Brown, E. W. Oglebay, Andrew J. C. Foyé, Thomas Ewing, Jr., William S. Hawk, George W. Perkins, James H. Hoyt, Samuel Mather, Leander H. Crall, Charles C. Tegethoff, Henry W. Taft, Thomas H. Wheeler, Francis Key Pendleton, William C. Beer, George S. Russell, Warren Higley, treasurer; Francis M. Applegate, secretary.

Judge Higley moved that a ladies' reception be arranged for February; the time and character to be announced by the entertainment committee, with the approval of the governing committee. The motion was unanimously adopted. Colgate Hoyt was, on motion, delegated to convey to the Ohio Society of Philadelphia the greetings of the Ohio Society of New York, on the occasion of the first formal banquet to be given by the Philadelphia organization. Changes in the composition of the entertainment committee were announced by the president; the committee to consist of the following members: Francis X. Butler, Sturges S. Dunham, Orrel A. Parker, Roland Hazen, Milton P. Jackson.

In the meeting of the Society on February 11th, Thomas Ewing, Jr., was requested to convey to Hon. Milton I. Southard the sympathy of the Society because of his long-continued illness. President McCook called especial attention to the coming ladies' reception, and also to the annual banquet to be given on March 18th at the Waldorf-Astoria, adding the pleasant and welcome announcement that the Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States, would be the guest of honor.

Hon. David Kemper Watson, of Washington, ex-attorney-general of Ohio, a member of the commission appointed by President McKinley to revise the laws of the United States, was then introduced, and delivered an instructive and interesting address on "Lincoln as a Lawyer."

On the evening of Thursday, February 23d, the Hotel Astor, on Times

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Square, was temporarily in the possession of the Ohio colony in New York, from an early hour of the evening until an hour or so after midnight.

The occasion was the winter reunion and reception of the Ohio Society of New York, which on this occasion took the form of a dinner and a dance.

The arrangements were in the hands of the standing entertainment committee, which was composed as follows: Orrel A. Parker, chairman; Francis X. Butler, Roland Hazen, Sturges S. Dunham, Milton P. Jackson. These gentlemen were ably assisted by the chairman of the house committee, A. J. C. Foyé, and a floor committee constituted as follows: A. Ernest Foyé, Charles D. Hilles, Winchester Fitch, Robert M. Fulton, William L. Stout, Addison W. Gilmore, Mark A. Noble, George M. Parker, E. H. Patrick, Kirke E. Bishop, Andrew McL. Parker. The members of the entertainment committee were designated by the wearing of red carnations, and the floor committee by the same flower in white.

The rooms engaged for the evening are what was known as the large ball-room and the small ballroom, although either of them is sufficient in size to come under the former designation. They are connected, and have a large corridor, cloak rooms and balconies attached. The dinner was served in the large room, and dancing occurred in the other.

The members and their guests began to arrive at seven, the hour set for the reception, and it was a half hour and more before the seats were taken at the tables. There were some forty of these, averaging seven or eight persons to a table. There were also three or four tables larger in size, for the accommodation of special groups arranged among the members and their friends.

There was no speecmaking or formal exercises of any sort. Thomas Ewing, Jr., the first vice-president, presided in the absence of President John J. McCook, and in a few words welcomed the guests of the evening.

The music furnished, both during the dinner and at the dance, was by Van Baar's orchestra, one of the best in the city. The committee in charge did not think it wise to arrange a formal order of dances in advance, but made up the programme as the evening advanced, selecting such dances as seemed most desired by the dancers. A card was hung out before each dance, naming the one then announced and the one next succeeding.

The evening was one of unalloyed enjoyment. A guest from Ohio touched upon one feature in these words: "I had no idea that Ohio could muster in New York any such an assemblage of 'fair women and brave men.' The 'three hundred Buckeyes' need not feel afraid to compare themselves with the 'four hundred' of New York."

In the meeting of the governing committee, on March 13th, a sub-committee suggested that the Society should secure oil portraits of ex-Presidents Grant, Hayes, Harrison and McKinley.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The nineteenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society of New York, given on the evening of Saturday, March 18, 1905, in the banquet hall of the Waldorf-Astoria, was an unqualified success, as have been all of the festal gatherings of this organization. It was given in honor of Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States, a son of Ohio. He was for a number of years a non-resident member of the Society, and recently, by unanimous vote, had been enrolled upon its small and select list of honorary members. Beside the vice-president a number of other prominent men, whose names will be found below, were present as the guests of the Society.

Fully five hundred members and their guests sat down to the banquet, while the two galleries were filled with ladies, who came in when the speech-making commenced.

The vice-president and the other guests from the seat of government arrived in New York in a special car placed at the disposal of the Ohio Society by courtesy of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. They were escorted to the Manhattan Hotel, whose proprietor, William S. Hawk, is a member of the Society, and always insists upon entertaining its guests free of charge. At a little after six, the vice-president and the others were escorted to the Waldorf-Astoria by members of the reception committee, where for a half hour and more an informal reception was held.

At a little after seven o'clock the doors of the banquet hall were thrown open, and the members entered and took their designated places. The guests of honor were then conducted to the president's table, Vice-President Fairbanks heading the procession under escort of President John J. McCook. Grace was said by Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D., pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle.

The names of those who had been invited to occupy seats at the table of honor were as follows. With few exceptions, all of the gentlemen were present:

Mr. Colgate Hoyt, past president Ohio Society; Mr. Gilbert E. Roe, president Wisconsin Society; Mr. Marion J. Verdery, president Southern Society; Rev. J. Nevett Steele, president Maryland Society; Rev. Wayland Hoyt, D.D., president Ohio Society of Philadelphia; Hon. James E. Campbell, ex-governor of Ohio; Mr. W. Butler Duncan, president St. Andrew's Society; Hon. Charles A. Towne, M.C., of New York; Brig.-Gen. Frederick D. Grant, U. S. A.; Gen. Thomas H. Hubbard, president New England Society; Maj.-Gen. James F. Wade, U. S. A.; Hon. M. Linn Bruce, lieutenant-governor of New York; Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, senator from West Virginia; Mr. Andrew Carnegie, of New York; Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States; Mr. John J. McCook, president of the Ohio Society; Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, secretary of the treasury; Mr. E. H. Harriman, of New York; Hon. Nathan B. Scott, senator from West Virginia;

Nineteenth Annual Banquet
of the
Ohio Society of New York

In Honor of

Charles Warren Fairbanks

Vice-President of the United States

At the Waldorf-Astoria, Saturday, March 18, 1905
at 6:30 p.m.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Hon. Warren G. Harding, lieutenant-governor of Ohio; Rear-Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan, U. S. N.; Mr. August Belmont, of New York; Mr. Samuel Rea, vice-president Pennsylvania Railroad Company; Hon. Melville E. Stone, president Illinois Society; Hon. George C. Holt, United States District Judge; Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, pastor Broadway Tabernacle; Dr. Henry N. Tift, president Board of Education of Greater New York; Hon. Robert C. Ogden, president Pennsylvania Society; Hon. Oscar S. Straus, of New York; Gen. Henry L. Burnett, past president Ohio Society.

The room presented a beautiful sight, especially after the ladies had filled the boxes surrounding the hall in the two balconies. There was a raised dais at one end, where was placed the president's table, while the members and their friends sat at round tables in groups of ten. Flowers were upon each table, while a beautiful array of flags filled the wall space behind the dais. The star spangled banner was there in abundance, as were also the flags and coats of arms of New York state and New York city. Conspicuous among them was the flag of the buckeye state, bearing the word "Ohio" in letters of gold, with the coat of arms of the state woven into the silken folds of the banner.

At each plate was a handsome souvenir programme, prepared by the souvenir committee, Judge Warren Higley, chairman. It was designed by Thomas A. Sindelar.

The programme was in a fine kid-finished box with the seal of Ohio upon the lid. The cover was a buckeye brown, tied with a white silk ribbon and the words, "Ohio Society of New York, nineteenth annual banquet," were printed upon it in old-fashioned text.

The frontispiece was a photogravure portrait of Vice-President Fairbanks. Opposite was a handsome design, containing the maps of Ohio and Indiana. On the map of Ohio was a picture of a log cabin like that in which Mr. Fairbanks was born. On the map of Indiana was a picture of his modest home in Indianapolis. Perched on top of the maps was an American eagle, with the national capitol as a background. The maps were surrounded by an artistic arrangement of buckeye leaves and blossoms. Beneath were the words:

NINETEENTH ANNUAL BANQUET
OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK
IN HONOR OF
CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS
VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES
AT THE
WALDORF-ASTORIA
SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1905

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

On succeeding pages were the menu, the programme of toasts and a list of the committees. The banquet committee has been already given. The reception and souvenir committees were constituted as follows: Reception: Andrew Ernest Foyé, chairman; H. B. Brundrett, Charles E. Warren, Charles C. Ruthrauff, Edward W. Parker, Charles D. Hilles, Winchester Fitch, Orrel A. Parker, Scott R. Hayes, George A. Beaton, H. H. Brockway, P. S. Jennings, Horace J. Morse, Charles A. Moore, P. Ryan, James G. Shaw, Andrew McC. Parker, Leonard D. Morrison, Peter H. Burnett, John J. Welch, Philip B. Gaynor, Lewis C. Ruch, John E. Weeks.

Souvenir: Warren Higley, chairman; Charles D. Hilles, Carlton T. Chapman, Lewis C. Ruch, Orrel A. Parker, Seth Thayer Stewart.

At the plate of each member and guest was a small box containing a reproduction of "One Buckeye Cabin," upon which was the date of the evening of the banquet, in letters of gold, and the name of the Ohio Society of New York.

The order of toast was as follows:

John J. McCook, presiding. Grace by Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D., pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle.

"The President of the United States." The members of the Society and their guests will respond by standing while the band plays "The Star Spangled Banner."

"Ohio in its Relation to the Nation." Responded to by the Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States.

"The Empire State Salutes Her Adopted Buckeye Sons." Responded to by the Hon. M. Linn Bruce, lieutenant-governor of the state of New York.

"Ohio Patriotism." Responded to by the Hon. Warren G. Harding, lieutenant-governor of Ohio.

"The Great Ordinance of 1787." Responded to by the Hon. Charles A. Towne, M.C.

"The Army." Responded to by Maj.-Gen. James F. Wade, U. S. A.

"The Navy." Responded to by Rear-Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan, U. S. N.

At 9:28 p. m., President McCook arose, and after obtaining silence said:

"Ladies and Gentlemen, Fellow Members of the Ohio Society, and Our Honored Guests:—It is the privilege of the president of our Society, at each of these annual gatherings, to extend a cordial and hearty welcome, a genuine, heartfelt, buckeye welcome to all who are present with us, and this I do tonight. (Applause.)

"No one can cast his eye about this room without being proud of a state that has given birth, or a sheltering home, to so many fair women and brave men. The Ohio Society is unquestionably the oldest of the state organizations here in New York, and it is undoubtedly the largest, unless the progressive Pennsylvania Society, under the leadership of its aggressive president, Mr. Ogden, who honors us by his presence to-night, may have relegated us to a second place. We question the fact, however, and we will still claim to be the oldest and the largest of the state societies.

“The other states, carved out of the original Northwest Territory, have each established societies here in New York, with the exception of Indiana, and their organization is now being effected. We have the honor of welcoming here to-night the Hon. Melville E. Stone, president of the Illinois Society (applause), and the Hon. Gilbert E. Roe, president of the Wisconsin Society (applause), and we hope before long to welcome on these occasions the representatives of the Michigan and Indiana societies. (Applause.)

“At the date of the annual meeting two years ago, the Society had 435 members; in 1904 we had an enrollment of 536 members, including the honorary members; and this year we have a membership of over 600, exclusive of our honorary members. Ought we not, as a matter of state patriotism and pride, see to it that our Society is strengthened and increased by the addition of many new and valuable members during the next twelve months?

“During the last year the Society has lost by death, the Hon. George K. Nash, an ex-governor of the state, and twelve other valuable members. As these, our friends and companions, pass over to the great majority, we mourn their absence, but we rejoice in their lives and will always cherish their memory.

“This Society has no debts, and has a surplus fund of some $15,000. (Applause.) That is not a very large sum, but it is adequate for our purposes, and yet not so large as to be a temptation to any aggressive female Ohio financier. (Laughter and continued applause.)

“I call the attention of the treasurer to the manner (applause and laughter) in which that innocent remark was received, and warn him to see that our funds are not ‘Cassied,’ as I believe they call it now in Cleveland. (Applause and laughter.) The satisfactory membership and financial condition of our Society reflects credit upon the officers, the members of the governing board, and the committees who have administered its affairs during the past year. I can say without hesitation that no organization that I know of (with the exception of its president) is better officered, and has more efficient committees, with stronger, abler, hard-working members than those working in the interest of this Ohio Society.

“Patriotism is always recognized as holding a high place, if not the highest, among the civic virtues. Ohio as a state, and Ohio men have always been patriotic, and they have been patriotic at a time when it meant something for them to be patriotic, when they were called upon to make sacrifices in the interest of their state and of the nation.

“There are two characteristics which all Americans like to see, but unfortunately do not always find in their public men, namely, honesty and courage. Personal honesty, honesty of conviction, and the courage to carry into effect what the conviction teaches to be right, at the time and in the way that God permits the man with the conviction to see what he conceives to be the right. The exceptionally great honor recently paid to an American citizen by the people of all parties, irrespective of creeds, irrespective of any divisive line, makes us feel that the people of this country have found a man, with those characteristics of honesty and courage in Theodore Roosevelt, the president of the United States. (Applause and cheers long continued.)

“On an occasion like this it always becomes the loyal sons of Ohio to indicate their sentiments of national loyalty by drinking the health of the president of the United States. The members of the Society and their guests will respond to this toast by standing, while the band plays the ‘Star Spangled Banner.’”

(The members remained standing until the conclusion of the national hymn, which was followed by applause.)

President McCook: “The ordinary annual meetings of the Ohio Society are held on the 29th day of November in each year, an anniversary which is surrounded by much uncertainty, and yet it is claimed by many of us as one of great interest to our state. There is possibly more satisfaction in celebrating an event, the date of which you are not sure of, than one that is absolutely certain. However that may be, we hold our annual meetings on the 29th day of November. On such occasions a good dinner is usually served, and then the retiring officers present their final reports, new officers are elected, and we have a heart to heart talk about anything that is of interest to Ohio people, especially that kind of interest that makes an Ohio man leave his native state to better his condition in another, or to find one where there is less competition for public office.

“On the 29th day of November, two years ago, we had such an ordinary annual meeting, but we had with us two members of our Society, first, the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, who has since been honored by his promotion to the highest diplomatic post in the gift of our government by his appointment as ambassador to the Court of St. James. Mr. Reid is absent to-night in California, but he asks me to express his cordial salutations and heartiest regards to all members of the Society and their guests present. The other distinguished member who was with us on that occasion was Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks. (Applause and cheers.) Something that was said or done by Mr. Fairbanks, Senator Fairbanks, as he was then, moved one of the members of the Society to prophesy. The prophecy was that Senator Fairbanks would be the next vice-president of the United States. (Applause and cheers.) With that easy manner and grace with which the great politician can turn away a tempting proposal (laughter) Senator Fairbanks gave us to understand that such an event was not at all likely to occur. I was, however, deeply impressed by the prophecy, and always having the interest of the Ohio Society at heart, I turned to the Senator at once, and said, 'I engage you now as the guest of honor at the next annual banquet of the Ohio Society, when we shall expect you to appear as vice-president of the United States.' And here he is. (Applause.)

"I am not going to engage in any prophecy to-night. It is a bad thing to foretell the future too often, for the best informed prophet will sometimes slip up, but that effort worked out splendidly, and Senator Fairbanks received the honor in which we all rejoice, and which is for the great good of this country. He is an Ohio man born; he was brought up in Ohio; he had the advantage of receiving his education at what was then a small Ohio college; he studied law in Ohio; was admitted to the bar in Ohio; and best of all he got his wife in Ohio. (Applause and cheers.) With this wonderful equipment of Ohio advantages he stepped over into Indiana to see what opportunities were offered for that kind of a man. (Laughter.) It has been my privilege to have known him personally and professionally for many years—I won't tell how many years—and I am glad to say that at the end of every five years his friends could not fail to note that Charles W. Fairbanks occupied a higher, better, and loftier position than ever before. I will not take your time by speaking of his great professional success, or of the fine, even brilliant services he has rendered to the country in the United States Senate. That record is written and read of all men. It has stood the test of numerous campaigns, which is, I believe, the best test of a record. We have the satisfaction of receiving him to-night as our chief guest of honor, and I consider it a great privilege to present to this assemblage of Ohio men and their guests, the Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States." (Applause and cheers, given standing.)

To the toast, "Ohio in its Relation to the Nation," Mr. Fairbanks responded as follows: "President McCook, Members of the Ohio Society of New York, Ladies and Gentlemen:—I thank you for this cordial greeting, for your more than generous welcome. It is always a real pleasure to me to meet the members of the Ohio Society of New York, and it was never more gratifying than it is to-night.

"The distinguished chairman, the president of this great Society, whose name has added honor to the state of Ohio, has been guilty of a little bit of ungenerous and unkindly treatment. You would not suspect it, looking at him. (Laughter.) When he came to Washington to extend the invitation of this Society, he said to me at the outset, 'You will not be expected to make a speech.' I instantly accepted the invitation. (A voice: "Oh, McCook!" Mr. McCook: "What did you think we wanted you for?")

"I was betrayed then, and I am in the trap now. Think of my surprise, after that very generous statement, asking me simply to come and have a heart to heart 'talk' with the boys from Ohio, as he affectionately expressed it, when day before yesterday I received a telegram reading, 'When will the manuscript of your speech be sent to New York.' (Laughter.) Now, he has got to take just what I am going to give him.

"Fellow Buckeyes, as we meet about this festal board, we seem to be brought closer and closer together. We are brought into more intimate fellowship; we seem to have a common interest in each other; our memories go back to the old state of Ohio, venerable mother of us all, where cluster so many happy recollections of the long ago. I am not in favor of class distinctions in the United States, but having talked much of Ohio to one of my young boys, he said to me once, 'You seem to be in favor of creating classes in the United States.' I said, 'No, what do you mean?' 'You seem to be in favor of creating two classes, those born in Ohio, and those who were not born in Ohio.' (Laughter and applause.)

"There is something about the Buckeyes I like. How they take pride in their state! They love it; they have an affection for it; they have always believed in the ascendancy of its star, in Ohio's destiny. I think I never knew the pride of Ohioans in Ohio illustrated better than in the case of a justice of the peace who exercised his high judicial functions in the old neighborhood where I was born, in Union county, Ohio. He appreciated the great privilege the good Lord had given him of being born in Ohio, and what was greatest and best of all, next to being born in Steubenville was to be born in Union county, Ohio. This justice of the peace was elected to the high and honorable office he held by the partiality of his neighbors, and when he came to try his first case and swear the first witness, he seemed to be impressed with the fact, first, that he was an Ohioan; second, that he was a justice of the peace. Said he to the trembling witness, 'Hold up your right hand.' The witness held up his hand. Said he, 'You do solemnly swear, before me and Almighty God, that you will tell the truth.' (Laughter and applause.) And I may say that he was one of the most modest of our fellow citizens.

"We are all proud of Ohio. She has been a strong and conservative state. She has been a patriotic state. Wherever the nation's good name was involved, she responded in full measure. She has made her ample contribution of men in all the walks of life. She has contributed men who have been mighty in the councils of the nation. She has contributed some of the greatest captains that ever have led armies down to the battlefields of any country. (Applause.) We are proud not only of what she has been, but we are proud of what she is. We are gratified to know that, great and splendid as her past has been, her present is greater, and her future looms high with hopeful promise. The sons of Ohio are to-day upholding the best traditions of those who in the past added lustre to her name.

“We are not only proud of Ohio, but we are proud of our country to which she has made her mighty contribution. We are proud of our country because she has taken a guiding place in the affairs of the world. We are proud of Ohio—of the United States—Mr. Chairman, that slip was not an unnatural one, for Ohio and the United States are almost synonymous. (Laughter and applause.) We are proud of the United States because of her incomparable material resources. The centuries may come and go, and they will not be exhausted. We may say without boastfulness that the United States can, if supreme need be, stand against the entire world. The United States fears not the strongest among the alien powers, not only because of her mighty armies, not only because of her fleets which have so splendidly vindicated her name upon the seas, but because of the spirit of justice which abides in the American heart. (Applause and cheers.)

“We are gratified to see—but, Mr. Chairman, I don’t wish to take up any more time.”

Mr. McCook: “Please go ahead.”

“Now he is asking me to go ahead. When I came here Senator Scott, from the state of West Virginia—and the best thing about him is, he was born in Ohio—took me aside and said, ‘How long are you going to speak?’ I said, ‘Ten minutes.’ ‘Good,’ he said, ‘you’ll make a hit, and,’ said he, ‘if you make it five minutes you will carry the audience before you.’ (Laughter and applause.) And now the chairman wants me to speak on.”

Voices: “Go on! Go on!”

“We are gratified to know that there is abroad among the people of the United States, a strong, healthy, a growing sentiment in favor of settling international differences by an appeal to the supreme court of reason. (Applause.) And in making that remark I am gratified to know that there sits at my right here one of the most powerful advocates of that great doctrine in the United States, the Hon. Andrew Carnegie. (Applause and cheers.) We are gratified to see, in the onward and upward march of the human race that the tribunal at The Hague has been established, and in the centuries to come, when the councillors of the nations of the earth meet about the deliberative board to settle great international questions, they will meet under a roof raised by the hand of the greatest philanthropist since the world began. (Continued applause and cheers.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ I realize that we share a common pride in the glories of a common state. I realize that we share in common the honor of a great republic, yet we do not share allegiance to a common political party. Nevertheless, I may say, without fear of violating the proprieties of this non-partisan occasion, that there has been rendered inestimable service to the cause of international arbitration by the President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt. (Applause and cheers.)

“ There is a difference among eminent statesmen with respect to details, but it is proper to say that the President has given to the cause of international arbitration an impetus world-wide and of lasting benefit. Differences as to details will be eradicated or harmonized. In good time the doctrine of international arbitration will be firmly established, and in the future most of the questions which vex the governments of the earth will be settled, not by a cold and merciless appeal to arms, but in the deliberative chamber, where a high sense of international justice holds supreme sway. (Cheers.)

“ The world is coming more and more to think at the same time upon the same questions. The cable and the telegraph knit together capitals and centres of commerce; railways bind governments to each other; the mighty merchantmen of all powers thread the seas, bringing the marts and the citadels of commercial power into closer touch with each other than ever before. We read in the same paper the debates in the American Congress, in the French Chamber of Deputies, in the House of Commons, in the German Reichstag, upon social, political, and commercial questions. The United States is destined in the future to exercise a more wholesome and a more powerful influence on the world than ever in all of her splendid past. (Applause.) She will exercise it not through the sword; she will exercise it not through her mighty ships of war; she will exercise it not through her invincible armies; she will exercise her influence upon the thought of the world through her high ideals; high and lofty they are. (Applause.) For the United States is inspired with a spirit of justice. Let us inculcate amongst our countrymen that commanding sense of international right, which makes for international righteousness and international peace. (Applause.) That international peace which is the result of the operation of moral forces is to be desired far beyond that peace which is enforced as a matter of might. That peace which comes to the nations of the earth by the exercise of justice, is a peace which is abiding, which is everlasting. Let us hope, my countrymen, that the United States will be true to her supreme opportunity; and while she prepares her ships of war, while she makes more efficient her armies, that she lead in the effort to bring the nations of the earth to the serene, deliberative chamber where the voice of reason will be the all important, the omnipotent voice. (Applause and cheers.)

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“My friends, permit me to again acknowledge, from the depths of a Buckeye heart, my gratitude for your kindly greeting. I shall carry it through life as one of my most cherished memories. In leaving you, as I am loath to do, let me indulge the hope, and I have no doubt our good friends who were not born in Ohio will share in it, that the Ohio of to-day may prove a truthful prophecy of the Ohio of to-morrow. I thank you all.” (Continued applause and cheers, the audience standing.)

Mr. McCook: “Those of us who have unselfishly surrendered the joys of life in Ohio for the benefits, delights and satisfaction of life here in New York can never be sufficiently grateful for the open-armed welcome with which we have been received and with which we are encouraged to remain and live on forever here in New York. We shall now listen to a few remarks, responsive to the toast ‘The Empire State Salutes Her Adopted Buckeye Sons,’ which will be responded to by the Hon. M. Linn Bruce, lieutenant-governor of the state of New York.” (Applause.)

Lieutenant-Governor Bruce said: “Colonel McCook, Members of the Ohio Society and Fellow Guests: I also am here under some misapprehension. Like the distinguished vice-president, I was given the impression that I was not expected to say anything. I assumed that our presence was desired simply to lend distinction to the occasion.

“I am very glad to have a seat at this board, and to look into the faces of so many prodigals from the old Buckeye state who are here in New York wasting their substances in riotous living. (Laughter and applause.) Let me give you a word of counsel. These good times may not always last. The other fellows may get in, and then, of course, there will arise a mighty famine in this land and you will begin to be in want. The surplus in your treasury will dwindle down. You will then no longer assemble in this gilded hall, but somewhere over on the East Side and dine on husks. Then you will turn your faces backward to the old Buckeye state, but I assure you that the older brothers are there and they are not out in the fields either. They are sitting around holding fat jobs, wearing the best robes and the rings, and keeping one eye on the veal in the stall. You need not expect to get the welcome that the prodigal of the Scriptures received.

“This magnificent assembly, however, is as much a tribute to the Empire state as it is to the Buckeye state. When we hear a Buckeye talk we think there is no place so desirable as old Ohio, but I notice that a great many have been willing to leave the Buckeye state (laughter) and establish their homes here in the Empire state. In fact much of the achievement that has given this state the title of the Empire state is due to the splendid service and the splendid work of her adopted sons. I am willing to admit this because I myself was born in Pennsylvania. I remarked this to my distinguished neighbor upon my left (Mr. Carnegie), a citizen of New York, Pennsylvania, Scotland, Great Britain and the whole world (applause), and he said: 'Yes, New York is getting along pretty well, but she is pretty hard pushed by Pennsylvania, and if it wasn't for Greater New York she would be passed.' And he intimated that the pre-eminence of Pennsylvania was soon coming. Well, if we are to give way to any other state, I prefer to give way to the state in which I was born.

"It has been said that 'Next to the worship of the Father of us all, the grandest and the noblest of human emotions is love for the land that gave us birth.' There is a certain sort of patriotism, however, among some men which manifests itself in a love for the entire country, but no love for any particular town or city or state. I am glad to know that such men are not reared in Ohio. A Buckeye man is always talking to you about the Buckeye state and what the Buckeye state has done. Of course it would be a great impropriety for those of us of the Empire state to boast. Those who lead may leave boasting to others. Other cities may be great, but New York is always Greater. (Laughter and applause.)

"We are citizens of no mean state and of no mean city. And I wish that we had more pride of the city in which we live. I was born, or reared, rather, up in a little village in Delaware county with less than 500 inhabitants, and do you know if any fellow went out of that town and didn't say a good word for the town it were well if he never came back. You don't find the same sentiment in those living here, the second city of the world, the first on this continent, yes, upon this hemisphere; first in population, in finance, in commerce, in all that should make us proud. You never meet a man from 'Frisco' but you find him praising 'Frisco.' You meet a man from Denver and he will tell you that it is the finest city in the West. You meet a man from Chicago and you can't stop him talking about the greatness of Chicago. You meet a man from Boston and he is all the time sounding the praises of Boston. But you meet a man from New York and he is usually finding fault, whining about the shortcomings of New York.

"New Yorkers, let us learn a lesson right here to-night from these Buckeyes. Let us start right out from this time, and wherever we are, sound loud and long the praises of this the grandest city in the world. (Applause and cheers.) I was speaking not long ago with a citizen of New York, and he spent most of the time berating the police and other departments of the city of New York. Well, now, we have our troubles; troubles in the police department, but they are up near the top. There is not a city in the world that has a braver or better rank and file than we have in the police department of the city of New York. Look at our fire department; at our public charities; at our public parks; at our magnificent harbors; at our financial and commercial supremacy. New Yorkers, wake up! Sound the praise of New York! New York city and New York state, as the Buckeye shouts for the Buckeye state. I propose the toast, The City and State of New York." (Applause and cheers.)

Mr. McCook said: "Fellow members, I have been especially warned to do no prophesying to-night; but it won't hurt any man who is interested in and who wishes well to the greater city of New York and the great Empire state of New York to keep his eye on the man who has just spoken to us, M. Linn Bruce, the lieutenant-governor of New York. (Applause and cheers.)

"The next toast comes very close to the heart of every Buckeye. We always have at these annual meetings an official representative of our dear old home state. Last year, you will remember, we had with us our good friend, the true and devoted friend of Senator Hanna and President McKinley, Governor Myron T. Herrick. (Applause.) This year we have with us the lieutenant-governor of the state of Ohio, the Hon. Warren G. Harding, who will speak to us upon 'Ohio Patriotism.'" (Applause and cheers.)

Lieutenant-Governor Harding said: "Mr. Toastmaster, Gentlemen and Ladies: If I may make official response to the speech of the lieutenant-governor of New York, I bid you know, when you want to return to Ohio, that there are a thousand fatted calves browsing upon the hills awaiting your return. (Laughter and applause.)

"I wish I might make excuses, but the introduction of your toastmaster has forbidden it. I was invited here to speak."

President McCook: "Thank you."

"I feel just a little bit like a young friend of mine in my own county, who is now our prosecuting attorney, a well meaning, industrious young Republican, who ran for office in a Democratic county, without means; and he made a personal canvass throughout the county, and stopping one evening at the Messenger home, he found Mr. Messenger busy milking. The cow was very restless and the milking was difficult, and Mr. Clark, to further his political influence, said, 'Mr. Messenger, can't I help you in your work, milking that cow?' And he said, 'You might stand at her head, if you will, and distract her attention.' So Mr. Clark, true to his promise, stood at the cow's head, and thus distracted she yielded the milk. And then Clark, true to his candidacy, said, 'Mr. Messenger, I am a candidate for prosecuting attorney; I am running against Wilbur Jacoby on the Democratic ticket.' And Mr. Messenger said, 'Yes, I know.' And Clark said, 'Well, has Jacoby been out to see you yet?' And he said, 'Yes, he is back of the straw stack now, holding that pesky calf.' (Laughter and applause.)

"You know, I am suspicious, sometimes, of these distinguished public speakers. I heard Daniel Sully tell the story of Father O'Brien, who announced to his parish that inasmuch as the October days had come, on the next Sunday he would take up a collection to raise funds to buy coal with which to heat the church. 'We have a large church,' he said, 'and it will require a large fund to buy coal, and next Sunday I want every one of you to contribute according to his means, if only a penny, or a nickel, or a dime, or a dollar if you can.' The next Sunday he again announced the collection and said, 'To make sure you will do your duty, I am going to take the collection myself.' And then the good Father started out with the box, and everybody contributed a penny, or a nickel, or a dime or more, until he struck O'Haggerty, and as he handed the box to O'Haggerty, O'Haggerty winked and gave nary a cent. Meeting O'Haggerty on the street the next day, the good Father said, 'O'Haggerty, what did you mean yesterday, when you winked in my face, and gave nary a cent to the contribution?' And O'Haggerty said, 'Oh, Father, I was the only man in the congregation onto your game; you heat this church with steam.' (Laughter and applause.)

"One story sometimes suggests another. Senator Scott of West Virginia, who is good enough to be an Ohio man, in addition to being one by birth, said, 'You ought to tell these fellows the story of the minister, who asked his congregation, or the members of it who wanted to go to heaven, to stand up.' They all stood up but one man, and he marvelled a little at that, and then said, 'All of you who want to go to'—well, I need not mention the place—'stand up.' And nobody stood. There was that lone, uncommitted man. And he said, 'I would like to know from the brother sitting in the end of pew No. 3, what he means by not taking either end of this proposition.' And the man said, 'Well, Mr. Minister, if it doesn't make any difference to you, I live in Ohio, and I would like to stay there just as long as I can.' (Laughter and applause.)

"I wish I might make some fitting remark, on an occasion of this kind, that would be a fitting tribute to your native state. Sitting here, gazing upon you sons of Ohio, and on those balconies rich with the womanhood of Ohio, I have been seeking for a reason to account for the accomplishment and the attainment of the buckeye state, and it seems to me I have found the reason in the splendid womanhood that finds its birth in Ohio. Don't you know that back of every achievement, back of the development of genius and art, and everything of value accomplished, is somewhere a woman's love?

"Mr. Toastmaster, to speak of Ohio patriotism is to speak of American patriotism, which has made this new-world republic the astonishing nation of the earth. Whether one alludes to patriotism as it flames in war, or as it proves the enduring energy of peace, buckeye patriotism is firmly rooted in an exultant and exalted citizenship, is the best the world knows, not necessarily indigenous to the soil, but developed in the very atmosphere which is the breath of a hopeful and confident people. All Americans love this matchless country of ours. Pulses are quickened and hearts are aglow when thoughts are turned to,

My native country, thee,
Land of the noble, free.

“Pride is well developed and firmly anchored, and I fancy sometimes that the Buckeye has just a little reason for that spirit and the special pride in his heart. Ohio was the first territory to be illumined by the glorious star of empire in its westward course. Our hills and fertile valleys and the stretches of plains for which the adventurous settlers contended against savage and foreign foe, when heroes perished without Fame’s acclaim—this was the first pearl in the crown of an expanded republic. The sturdy forefathers had thundered their proclamation of liberty at Lexington and Concord, and reared new standards of freedom in battling for their inherent rights. But peace brought the problem of government to be solved, and a mighty task was that. Old world republics had come and gone, monarchies had held their sway and had crumbled or faded and been forgotten save in the warning pages of history; but these new world patriots, warriors and statesmen, all conquering and unconquerable, turned to build a temple to a new and enduring republic. On Bunker Hill, Liberty’s beacon was lighted, was set aglow, to guide the oppressed and down-trodden of the old world to this haven of refuge, where they might drink freely of the waters of political life, and those stalwart men, filled with the enthusiasm of a new era, snatched the torches of liberty and enlightenment, started to plant them an imperishable flame in a westward course that encircles the globe to-day. (Applause.)

“With contagious hopefulness and irrepressible determination they came westward by the lakes, or pushed through the gateway of the Alleghanies, planting the banners of hope and freedom and laying the foundation of American homes. Puritan, Quaker and Cavalier joined in shaping this western jewel for fair Columbia’s crown, but more important than their blending of stalwart colonial strains was the impelling purpose back of these sturdy, yea, these heroic pioneers. Don’t you know, the first settler is a conqueror in heart and mind, and a giant in accomplishment? Two types make up the class, one loving adventure and impelled by a desire to accomplish, the other driven by firm resolution and an unalterable purpose to start anew and attain for himself. Little wonder that they accomplished mightily. Nothing strange that they proved a sturdy race and bred stalwart men and women. By the very laws of inheritance and development they gave to the state and the nation a race of men and women who were dominant at home, and sped on their sons and daughters to the awakening of the West and the development of this incomparable country of ours. (Applause.)

“Participants in every struggle for liberty, until the name in America stands for the best type the world has ever known, hating intolerance, and believing in enlightenment and activity as the best means of accomplishment and attainment, the proud buckeye citizen may well glory in Ohio patriotism, in peace or war.

“When an ambiguity in the constitution and the freedom of a race led to a tragedy that grieved the world, the men of Ohio gave 300,000 soldiers to the cause of Union. I will not yield to the promptings of pride to remind you of Ohio leaders who wrote their names in enduring fame. In the forum or on the battlefield, Ohio leadership has been ineffaceably written in history, but I think that Ohio patriotism is best revealed in the glad offering of her brave sons, the men and boys who made up more than one-ninth of all the armies that executed the commands of that hero of heroes, the great, sad-faced Emancipator of a human race, stalwart savior of the Union, Abraham Lincoln. (Applause and cheers.)

“From out the Northwest Territory, Virginia’s splendid gift to this Government, which must ever be her pride, and of which Ohio is a large and important unit, there were sent to war, to battle, in the four years of civil strife, a million muskets and thirty thousand swords. These men who devoted themselves to the Union were willing volunteers for the Union’s preservation. In history, the mighty army of the Potomac is written as made up almost exclusively of Eastern men; but gaze on Gettysburg’s silent field to-day, and standing well to the front of the great battle line which turned the tide of rebellion, are monuments to Ohio regiments, grateful marks of buckeye patriotism, which flamed and perished there in the cause of Union forever.

“When the draft riots threatened this great city in the stirring days of ’63, and troops were needed to execute the honorable purposes of the government without fear or favor, the victorious troops from Gettysburg were summoned, and two regiments of Ohio soldier boys stacked their arms in Wall street, and pitched their tents on Long Island’s nearby shores. And New York went to grateful sleep when the Ohio soldier boys came.

“Why, we men of to-day, we younger fellows, know little of the character of the stirring events of those trying times; but stand with me, ye men of Ohio, before Chattanooga cemetery, near where Grant looked from Orchard Knob, and saw our Ohio soldiers charge up Missionary Ridge: on the gateway you read, ‘On Fame’s eternal camping ground, etc.’ Gaze on the far-stretching lines of modest stones that make one fancy the martial heroes in line of light eternal, and the eye moistens and the heart is stirred, to read in eloquent and pathetic frequency, ‘Ohio, Ohio, Ohio, Ohio;’ until there are a thousand softened echoes of the sublime pathos of the patriotism that made this sacrifice that a nation might endure.

“Sometimes, my fellow citizens, former Ohio neighbors, there are triumphs of patriotism in peace. We are making the farms yield their tributes and the mines their wealth; we are sharing in the development of commerce and industry. We are apace with American progress, but we take our fliers of course when we accumulate wealth rapidly; we do a Chadwickian stunt now and then. (Laughter.) Now and then, just to remind Wall street that she is not the only one, and incidentally to bring our friend, Mr. Carnegie, out to see what Ohio is like. But I want to remind you that in Ohio, in the villages, and the cities, and on the farms, is a great, tranquil, sober-headed people, confident and grateful, which is the balance wheel to the public sentiment that makes the law of this republic.

“And so we look with confidence, glorifying Ohio’s sons and their achievements in the past. We look with confidence on our sons to-day; and for the future there is inspiring assurance, for there is the sparkling music of schooling youths who breathe the same atmosphere the fathers did, and they are gathering inspiration and exalted purpose from their traditions and glorious history. And, my friends, we know that American history has only begun. It is only sunrise to the national day. A century and a quarter is only a little while; and yet, how mightily we have achieved. Yet the wonders accomplished are mere suggestions of the future. Who can foretell what the human thought is equal to, what the sun at its meridian will reveal, what God intended in peopling this nation, this country with a dominant race of liberty-giving, liberty-loving men. And so I say that, while we may not be called upon to rule the world, with our ideals and an ideal republic we may idealize the governments of the earth. And when that day comes, around the festal fires illuminating the world will be sung the songs of the triumphs of peace; and on that day the glad voices of Ohio’s sons and daughters, from every company, regiment, and division, from every state and province, will swell the heaven-reaching strains. And that will be pride enough for the sons of Ohio.” (Applause and cheers.)

President McCook said: “This organization of ours has always been kept entirely free from any political or partisan bias. It is sometimes difficult to demonstrate this proposition, for if you bring Ohio men here to New York to speak about Ohio, with such Republican majorities as are given out there, you are not always sure of finding a Democrat.

“We have the great satisfaction of welcoming to-night a man of distinguished, I may properly say national reputation as a Democrat. While not invited here in any political capacity, this gentleman had the good fortune of being born in Michigan, one of the states set off from the Northwest Territory. He has rendered distinguished service in Congress, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate from a northwestern state, and he is now a representative, a Democratic representative in Congress from our own great city of New York. The Hon. Charles A. Towne, of this city, will speak to us upon 'The Year 1787.'" (Applause and cheers.)

Hon. Charles A. Towne said: "Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Vice-President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—If I might paraphrase the language of a very familiar anecdote, I should venture to observe that this is scarcely the place for a modest man. If I may say it without offence, I am quite reconciled, at this stage of the performance, to not having been born in the state of Ohio. After all that has been said as to the unparalleled merits of Ohio citizenship, a man who should at this hour arise and claim to exemplify it would be justly suspected of mature self-complacency. But I desire, sir, to render my acknowledgments, as one born in another of the sister states carved out of the Northwest Territory, for that generous latitude of construction which permits me to participate in your festivities almost after the manner of one native in the great commonwealth whose name sanctions this occasion. In fact, sir, I very narrowly missed an opportunity to challenge a vested right to be here; for my birthplace in Michigan was only a few miles northward of that line of demarcation between the two commonwealths which was long a subject of controversy, resulting, as those familiar with the ancient history of Ohio and Michigan will recall, in what is known as the 'Toledo War.' The condition, by the way, of the compromise that terminated hostilities was, as is usual in cases where Ohio is a party to the compromise, that the boundary established was the line that Ohio wanted. (Laughter.) Now, sir, if Ohio had only chosen to lay claim to a little more of southern Michigan, it would have been my lot to be born under the auspices of the Ohio constellation. Therefore, while I may not avail myself of the privileges of a native son, I may venture to speak with something of the freedom of a kinsman."

Mr. Towne spoke eloquently of Ohio and of the Northwest Territory. He then discussed the Philippine question and others in relation to our foreign policy, and in conclusion said:

"The ultimate national sovereignty is reserved to the people. Our liberties depend upon the observance of its constitutionally delegated functions by each branch of the national government. Any substantial impairment of this peculiar and characteristic adjustment of our system is a crime. Said Daniel Webster: 'Other misfortunes may be borne or their effects overcome. If disastrous war should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhaust our treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolate and lay waste our fields, still, under a new cultivation, they will grow green again and ripen to future harvests. It were but a trifle even if the walls of yonder capitol were to crumble, if its lofty columns should fall and its gorgeous decorations be all covered with the dust of the valley. All these might be rebuilt. But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government? Who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty? Who shall frame together the skilful architecture which unites national sovereignty with state rights, individual security and public prosperity? No, if these columns fall they will be raised not again. Like the Coliseum and the Parthenon they will be destined to a mournful, a melancholy, immortality. Bitterer tears, however, will flow over them than were ever shed over Grecian or Roman art; for they will be the remnants of a more glorious edifice than Greece or Rome ever saw, the edifice of constitutional American liberty.

“And so, men of Ohio, men of America, as we face the new problems and the new glories of the twentieth century, let us remember that we can be worthy of such a destiny only upon the condition of fidelity to the spirit of 1787; to the principles of morality, education and justice embodied in the great Ordinance, and to the observance of those wise provisions of political liberty and responsibility secured to us by the constitution of the United States.” (Applause.)

Mr. McCook said: “At our banquet a year ago, which took the form of an army and navy function, we had present with us the Secretary of War, an Ohio man, Lieutenant-General Chaffee, an Ohio man, and Major-General Corbin, then commanding this part of the United States, an Ohio man. We have with us to-night, as the senior major-general in command of this division, another Ohio man, who bears a name beloved of all Ohioans, the name of Wade. A son of that able, brave, forceful, aggressive, splendid Buckeye, the representative of Ohio on the floor of the United States Senate during the stormy period of the Civil War, whom we all admired and like to recall as ‘Old Ben Wade,’ of blessed memory. We will now hear a word of salutation from Maj.-Gen. James F. Wade, United States Army.” (Applause.)

General Wade, responding to the toast, “The Army,” spoke as follows: “Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—The subject assigned me to-night is a very large one. The first training of an army officer is to see and take instant advantage of conditions as they occur, and the reference by our distinguished guest of the evening to five or ten minutes was not lost upon me. (Laughter.) I am not going to keep you here to give you a history of the United States army, which would be a history of the United States, and the colonies preceding it. The United States army reminds me forcibly of the Ohio Society. The Ohio Society is made up of men of Ohio. The United States army is made up of men of the United States. The first requisite to a man joining that army is that he must be a citizen of the United States. It is made up of the people you know. Looking at this audience to-night, so far as any marks or anything is to distinguish them, they may be officers of the United States army in plain clothes. I want you to remember, when you hear of the United States army in our own country or abroad, that it is brave, patriotic, and efficient. Of course it is. It is made up of our own people, our relatives, our neighbors, our friends. When you hear that it is brutal, bloodthirsty, and cruel, say, 'It cannot be so, our people are not that way; that is not characteristic of the American people.'

"Another thing I would like to say: That when I entered the army in 1861, it was then, as now, the United States army; but in many sections of the country it was known as 'our army,' or 'your army,' the 'federal army,' and by various names. To-day, wherever you go, North, South, East or West, it is 'Our army,' the army of the United States." (Applause.)

Mr. McCook said: "The heart and affection of every American goes out not only to our army, but especially to the navy of the United States. We will have a word now from Rear-Admiral Coghlan, who commanded the U. S. ship 'Raleigh,' under Dewey at the battle of Manila Bay, who is now in command of the New York navy yard." (Applause.)

Admiral Coghlan said: "Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—Being a sailor, and this being Saturday night, before I say anything I will give you the toast of the sailor at this time of night and this day of the week, and that is, 'Sweethearts and Wives.' (Applause.) Mr. Toastmaster, and members of the Ohio Society, I was very much struck this evening when I came in with the number of Ohioans who were present. I imagined that there were very few of you remaining at home in the state, until fortunately I remembered the returns of last November in Ohio. And then I saw that you had left enough there to roll up big majorities in the right way. That is not partisan, nor is it political. (Laughter.) This reminds me of a story I heard some time ago—I mean the speaking this evening has reminded me of the story. A man was traveling along the road and had got near the boundary line of the state of Indiana, on the east, and came to a milestone, inscribed, '1 M.,' as usual, '1 M. from Ohio.' And he declared that even in death Ohioans were proud of themselves. 'Look at that tombstone,' he said, 'the only thing on it is, "I'm from Ohio."' (Laughter.)

"Ohio! The fame of the state has gone all over the world. I am sure you don't know it as well as I do. I was riding in a carriage in the city of Yokohama, in Japan, when your grand old man, Judge Bingham, had been recently appointed minister to that country. The friendly salutation of the Japanese is to bow low and to draw in his breath, forming the sound, 'O-ai-o'; and when Mr. Bingham heard that he grasped my arm and said,

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

‘Would you have thought it? These are the most intelligent people on God’s earth. Who would ever imagine that that poor peon there would have known that I was from Ohio.’ That is true. That anecdote I can vouch for.

“Brother Towne, over on the right there, has been talking about the Philippines. I, too, am a little interested in the Philippines, because I happened to be with the admiral when we got them. (Applause and cheers.) I have listened to many arguments pro and con about holding the Philippines, and I never heard but one good one against holding them. That was by a disappointed officeseeker from Indiana. He said, ‘Of course we can’t hold the Philippines; it is impossible.’ He said, ‘Think of it! We have fourteen hundred islands in the Philippine group. That means fourteen hundred governors, fourteen hundred secretaries, fourteen hundred marshals, five or six time fourteen hundred other officers. It will be utterly impossible to hold them. We can’t afford it. It would depopulate Ohio.’ (Laughter and applause.) Well, I notice that Ohio is not depopulated, and that we have the Philippines.

“I have been taught by various experiences in New York, that the art of after dinner speaking consists in saying nothing, and saying that very briefly. I think you will admit that I have shown the attributes of an orator in this respect, because I now bid you all good-night.”

Mr. McCook: “It is now my duty to declare the nineteenth annual banquet of the Ohio Society at an end. I bid you all good-night.”

CHAPTER XXII

IN the meeting of the Society on April 10, 1905, President McCook congratulated the members, and especially the officers and committees, on the success which had attended the banquet. A vote of thanks was extended to President A. J. Cassatt and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for favors extended in connection with that event, and to William S. Hawk, proprietor of the Manhattan hotel, for repeated favors in the way of entertainment of the Society's guests; not only on the occasion of this banquet, but in times past.

The thanks of the Society were extended to Hon. Myron T. Herrick, governor of Ohio, for the handsome portrait of himself, sent on request of President McCook. A letter was read from Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks, vice-president of the United States, conveying an expression of appreciation of the honor conferred upon him in electing him an honorary member of the Society, and also for the courtesy shown him at the annual banquet.

Secretary Applegate announced that on April 13th a meeting was to be held for the formation of an Ohio Society in Portland, Maine, and President McCook added that another Ohio Society had recently been launched in Detroit, Mich.

Winthrop E. Scarritt, recent president of the Automobile Club of America, delivered an interesting and instructive address on "The Automobile a New Factor in Civilization."

The meeting of the Society on May 8th was saddened by the announcement of the death in Zanesville, Ohio, on Wednesday, May 3, 1905, of Hon. Milton I. Southard, a former president of the Society, and for many years one of its most active, useful and best beloved members. President McCook stated that he had sent to Mrs. Southard, in the name of the Society, a telegram of which the following is a copy:

"NEW YORK, May 4, 1905.

"Mrs. Milton I. Southard, Zanesville, Ohio:

"The Ohio Society of New York deeply sympathizes with you and the members of your family in your irreparable loss. In the death of Mr. Southard the Society parts with one of its most highly esteemed members and ex-presidents. He possessed the respect, admiration and affectionate regard of every member of the Society, and we all feel his death as a personal loss.

“JOHN J. MCCOOK,
“President of the Ohio Society of New York.”

President McCook, on instructions from the Society, appointed the following gentlemen as a committee to prepare resolutions in honor of Mr. Southard's memory: Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Warren Higley, Leander H. Crall, Thomas Ewing, Jr. To this committee the names of President John J. McCook and Secretary Francis M. Applegate were added.

The Society then listened to a lecture, with stereopticon views, on “The Wonders of Colorado,” by Mr. William L. Mason.

The meeting of June 12th was largely of a memorial nature. The president announced that, following the death of Mr. Southard, had come that of Andrew J. C. Foyé, whose services of years in various capacities, and especially as a most able and industrious chairman of the house committee for many years, had left an impress of obligation upon the Society that could never be forgotten. Mr. Foyé had died at his home in New York city, after a sudden and brief illness, on May 26, 1905. The president then called for the report of the committee on the death of Mr. Southard, which was read by Mr. Applegate, as follows:

“Our past president, Milton Isaiah Southard, having been called from this life, we who have known him as an officer of our Society and as an intimate personal friend, wish to record the esteem and affection which we felt for him while he was among us and with which we now cherish his memory.

“Mr. Southard was born on the 20th day of October, 1836, in Perryton, Licking country, Ohio, and died at the residence of his brother, the Hon. Frank H. Southard, at Zanesville, on May 4, 1905. He was graduated from Denison University, with the class of 1861, and was admitted to the bar in 1863. He settled at Zanesville in 1866, where he entered upon the practice of his profession in partnership with his brother. Though later called to other duties and wider fields, he ever after looked on Zanesville as home. He was for three terms prosecuting attorney for Muskingum country, and later was a member of Congress from 1873 to 1879. Here he took conspicuous rank among the leading Democrats who served under Samuel J. Randall, in the heated and troublous contests of the second administration of General Grant and the administration of General Hayes. Removing to New York, in 1881, he formed a partnership with our first president, the late Gen.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Thomas Ewing, which was continued for many years. The intimacy between them was broken only by death.

“As member and officer, the welfare of this Society lay very close to his heart. He was one of its founders. His devotion is illustrated by the fact that he attended every one of the nineteen annual meetings which have been held. It was very soon after the meeting of last November that he was stricken with his fatal sickness.

“Confined to his bed for nearly five months with a malady which caused him excruciating and unremitting pain, he bore his suffering with fortitude and resignation. But as the dreary months passed by, his heart turned more and more toward the dear brother and the home which overlooks the beautiful valley of the Muskingum River, until at last the yearning overcame all warning or entreaty. On the perilous journey everything that love and skill could do or provide was brought to his aid. The joy of returning to the old home was so great that for a time hopes of recovery were entertained. But the end was near.

“Mr. Southard was a distinguished lawyer, of wide reading and of great industry, gifted with a retentive memory and sound judgment, in manner, dignified and elegant; in speech, ready and apt; he filled with ease the eminent position which he won by his honorable career. But we, whose Society he adorned, rather enter in our minutes that he was a simple Christian and a generous and gracious man, whom we loved and whom we sadly miss. Therefore, be it “Resolved, That we record our deep sense of loss in the death of Milton I. Southard, and that an engrossed copy of these minutes be sent to his bereaved widow and son as a faint expression of our sympathy with them in their great sorrow.

“Signed, John J. McCook, president; Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Warren Higley, Leander H. Crall, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Francis M. Applegate, secretary.”

The report and the resolutions were unanimously adopted. Remarks in tender recollection of Mr. Southard were made by a number of the members.

Resolutions on the death of Andrew J. C. Foyé were read by Judge Higley, and unanimously adopted, as follows:

“At his home, No. 163 West Seventy-ninth street, New York city, May 26, 1905, after an illness of three weeks, our friend and fellow-member, Andrew J. C. Foyé, died, leaving a wife and only son and a host of devoted friends to mourn his loss.

“Mr. Foyé’s unselfish devotion to the interests of the Ohio Society was remarkable. He was one of the original members and earliest officers. For several years he was our first vice-president; and for many years and up to the time of his death was chairman of the house committee, and as such faithfully guarded the Society against unnecessary expenses. In all matters relating to the finances of the Society he was wise and conservative. In all the dinners and banquets given by the Society he personally took charge and worked untiringly for their success, and served the Society in these matters as no other member could.

ANDREW J. C. FOYÉ

“There was no member of our Society so well and so generally known as he. No member brought into the Society so many new members as he. He apparently knew every member of the Society and could call them by name as he extended his enthusiastic and cordial greeting.

“How greatly, indeed, will he be missed from our gatherings at which for so many years he was an inspiring presence! And how much more greatly will he be missed in the general conduct of the Society’s affairs!

“Mr. Foyé was a successful business man. The zeal and energy and good judgment which he brought to every undertaking gave assurance of a favorable outcome. At the time of his death he was president of the Standard Graphite Company—a business he founded; a director in the Consolidated National Bank, and a director in the Parker-Ryan Construction Company. His business integrity was never questioned, and he commanded the confidence, respect and esteem of all with whom he had to do in business matters.

“Few men were endowed so generously with the helpful spirit as he. The sick and suffering he visited and comforted; the worthy unfortunate he relieved and put in the way to help themselves. The beggar never went hungry from his door. His kindly nature embraced humanity in its care. He was a true philanthropist.

“Mr. Foyé was a singularly devoted and loving husband and father, and his home was full of peace and joy. He loved this Society next to his home, and we loved and respected him for what he was and what he did. He was a true friend, generous and kind. His lofty character and purity of life ever commanded the confidence, respect and esteem of all who had the good fortune to know him. His life was fruitful in good works which will endure, and the world is far, far better for his having lived.

“Resolved, That the Ohio Society of New York most sincerely mourns the death of our late fellow-member, Andrew J. C. Foyé; and that we hereby extend to his bereaved widow and family our sincerest condolence and sympathy in their great sorrow.

“Resolved, That the forgoing memorial be spread upon the minutes of the Society and that an engrossed copy thereof be sent to the widow and son.

“Signed, John J. McCook, president; Warren Higley, chairman; Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Leonard D. Morrison, Leander H. Crall, Francis M. Applegate, secretary; committee.”

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The adoption of the report was followed by appropriate tributes to the memory of Mr. Foyé on the part of President McCook and others.

At a meeting of the governing committee, held on the same evening, it was decided that the vacancy in the chairmanship of the house committee, caused by the death of Mr. Foyé, should not be filled until the next annual meeting, and Mr. Morrison was designated to act as chairman until that time.

The opening meeting for the fall of 1905 was held on the evening of October 9th. A committee for the nomination of officers was selected, as follows: Henry L. Burnett, Colgate Hoyt, Richard J. Chard, Samuel H. Parsons, Orrel A. Parker, Leonard D. Morrison, Leander H. Crall. The president called the attention of the members to the receipt by the Society of a portrait of Andrew J. C. Foyé, painted by Franklin Tuttle, a member of the Society. A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Tuttle. Those present listened to an interesting lecture, with stereopticon views, on Berlin, by Prof. Henry Zick.

At the gathering of November 13th, the chairman of the nominating committee read the report of that body, proposing the following gentlemen to serve as officers during the ensuing year: President: John J. McCook; Vice-presidents: Henry P. Taft, Eben C. Thomas, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Emerson McMillin, William S. Hawk; Secretary: Francis M. Applegate; Recording secretary: Seth Thayer Stewart; Treasurer: Warren Higley; Trustees: Charles D. Hilles, Horace J. Morse, James G. Newcomb.

The president was duly authorized to appoint a committee on the annual banquet of 1906, with power to determine its character. The house committee also received power to make arrangements for the annual dinner, on the evening of November 29th. Those present then listened to a very interesting lecture on "Ohio in Education," especially prepared for the Ohio Society, with stereopticon views, by Charles Whitney Williams, assistant to the president of Oberlin College. The address was followed by remarks by President McCook and Dr. Charles F. Thwing, president of Western Reserve University.

The report of the committee on the death of Hon. John Hay, late United States secretary of state, an honorary member of the Society, was read and approved; and remarks in honor of the great statesman who had passed away were made by President McCook and Colgate Hoyt. These speeches expressed the love felt for John Hay by all who came under his personal influence. Tribute was paid to the manner in which he had aided in making the Diplomatic banquet one of the great events of its kind. The resolutions, as follows, were ordered engrossed and sent to the family of the great secretary:

AN
OF THE

Ohio Society
OF
NEW YORK,

held on Monday evening, November 13, 1905, the following memorial on the death of

HON. JOHN HAY,

was unanimously adopted:

In the death of Mr. Secretary Hay, in July last, not only the Ohio Society of New York and the Nation but the civilized world as well, have sustained a loss well nigh irreparable. It is fitting that this Society of which he was an Honorary Member for many years, should spread upon its record

a distinctive expression of its high appreciation of him and of its recognition of his imperishable renown.

The late President. Mr Kinley said of him.

"to my mind John Hay is the fairest flower of our civilization. Cultured, wealthy, with a love of travel, of leisure, of scholarly pursuits, with money enough to go where he likes, and to do what he likes, he is yet patriotic enough to give his great talents to his country."

This is lofty praise from a lofty source, but it is not in the least extravagant.

From the beautiful and gracious soil of our American civilization

There has never bloomed a more lustrous flower than that typical in its rare fragrance and beauty of the private life, public services and sacrificial patriotism of

John Hay.

*In the more intimate and personal relations, as son, husband, father, friend, citizen,
he was pure, devoted, wise,
Christian.*

*He was unsparing and fascinating in a beautiful and large courtesy. All who were fortunate enough to at all know him, the four presidents,
Lincoln, Hayes, McKinley,
Roosevelt, with whose administrations he was officially identified, the hosts of various* acquaintances whom his position, political and literary fame and most winning manner, caused to gather around him, all the great eyes of the earth with whom he had intercourse; the employees in his department, the servants who rejoiced to wait upon him in his home, all came under the spell of his entrancing personality.

He was uniquely modest of his own great literary or diplomatic achievements and successes. He could rarely be prevailed upon to speak of them. "What he had wrought in high official place, he preferred always to say the President had done." Mr. Hay was a shining instance of unquestionless integrity. It is surprising for how long and strenuous a section of our national life, and to the filling of how many manifold positions, this quiet American gentleman, and scholar was called.

He was Private Secretary to President Lincoln,

Secretary of State.

Through such unusual range and length of service, not the faintest suspicion of anything that was not in the utmost degree open and honorable was ever so much as whispered against the unteached integrity of
John Hay.

What John Hay wrought in the difficult and critical realm of diplomacy, will remain among the proudest pages of our National annals.

When he was asked to set his hand to the steering of the helm of State, the nation was entering upon its enlarged career as a predominant world power. Un-wonted and tangled were the problems confronting, but such triumphs as these are of Mr. Hay's accomplishing:

The restoring of diplomatic relations with conquered Spain, the Hay-Pauncefote convention clearing away the long time difficulties concerning the construction of the Inter-Oceanic Canal; the settlement of the Alaska Boundary Dispute; the preservation of the integrity of China, and the open door for commerce with her, notwithstanding the Boxer troubles; and the complications threatening through the Russo-Japanese War;

the gentle yet firm and victorious demand for the recognition by Turkey of the rights of American citizens;

The dignified protest against Russia's treatment of the Jews; are on the list of his surprising and beneficent achievements.

Any one of these would have marked him as one of the Immortals.

How various and incessant and successful was Mr. Hay's industry as the head of the Department of State, may be seen in the fact that during his seven years' tenure of office, at least fifty-eight formal international agreements were concluded and put in force, most of them being in the form of treaties.

It is not too much to say, as has been said, that John Hay was the founder of a new order of American diplomacy.

He was an orator without a peer. No speech than his more grasping of the subject, more clear and classic in its expression and more enticing in manner and in cadence.

Of Mr. Hay's ability as an editorial writer, it is enough to quote what Horace Greeley said, that though he had read a million editorials, one of John Hay's was the best he ever saw."

B

UT there is still another region in which Mr. Hay was preeminent, the realm of the scholar and the author Poet he was, and essayist, and successful novelist, and luminous historian.

Without doubt it was in literature that, if he could have been allowed to follow his natural and scholarly inclination, he most wished to rear permanent monument. Before no writer ever opened fairer prospects. The public was attentive for him. In mental resources and scholarly equipment he abounded. To this sphere his habits, his tastes, the opportunity of leisure given him by his wealth, beckoned.

most enticingly, but from this fair realm, as his life work, so large, so attractive to him, and so easily within his grasp, he sacrificially and patriotically turned at his country's call, and thus no more real sacrifice did any patriot ever make than did

John Hay.

While he was not a native of Ohio, he was married to a daughter of Ohio, and was for years a resident of the state, and his services and his resplendent fame are a large share of Ohio's glory, and this most gratefully, admiringly and lovingly would the Ohio Society of New York add a sheaf of praise and recognition to the memory of this conspicuous and consummate American.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The annual meeting of 1905 was held at the Hotel Manhattan, on the evening of November 29th. At the close of a very enjoyable dinner, the annual reports were presented. That of the governing committee showed the Society to have had a successful year, and to be in a flourishing condition. The treasurer's report showed a balance of $17,557.29, the largest the Society ever had. The secretary read the list of members who had died during the year past, and at the request of the president the members arose, and in silence drank to the memory of the dead. The membership committee reported that at that date the list of those belonging to the Society stood as follows: Honorary, 6; Resident, 358; Non-resident, 262; total, 626.

The election of officers being in order, the rules were suspended and the secretary directed to cast a unanimous vote for the gentlemen nominated.

President McCook made a graceful acknowledgment of thanks on behalf of the officers for the honor conferred upon them by the vote that had just been recorded. He then called upon a number of members for remarks, the following gentlemen briefly responding: Melville E. Ingalls, Colgate Hoyt, Henry L. Burnett, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Emerson McMillin and William S. Hawk. At a meeting of the governing committee held immediately after the adjournment of the Society, Albert F. Hagar was unanimously elected chairman of that body, and Andrew Ernest Foyé chosen chairman of the house committee. At a later date, President McCook announced his appointments for the coming year as follows: Committees: Literature and art: Albert Shaw, Robert Johnstone Mooney, Carlton T. Chapman, Howard Chandler Christy, Oscar B. Thomas; entertainment: Orrel A. Parker, Roland Hazen, Karl R. Miner, Lewis C. Ruch, Roy H. Haskins; auditing: David Homer Bates, Frank W. Hubby, Jr., Warner Ells, John M. Chandler, Joseph W. Yost; library: Winchester Fitch, P. Tecumsch Sherman, Elmer Dover, R. J. Chard, Frank S. Stelling; membership: Colgate Hoyt, Emory A. Stedman, William C. Beer, Francis X. Butler, Mark A. Noble; historian: James H. Kennedy; chaplain: Rt. Rev. William A. Leonard, D.D.

Banquet committee for 1906: Henry L. Burnett, chairman: Colgate Hoyt, Leander H. Crall, Whitelaw Reid, Thomas Ewing, Jr., Eben B. Thomas, William S. Hawk, Emerson McMillin, Henry W. Taft, Warren Higley, Samuel Mather, Charles B. Landis, Samuel H. Parsons, Melville E. Ingalls, H. B. Brundrett, John D. Archbold, George W. Perkins, William H. Truesdale, Henry D. THE FIRST SETTLEMENT IN OHIO

By JOHN Q. MITCHELL

A Paper Read Before the Ohio Society of New York, September 13, 1886

THE first step toward establishing a permanent settlement in the great territory "Northwest of the River Ohio," was taken in the month of June, 1783, by 288 officers and soldiers of the colonial army, under the lead of General Rufus Putnam. It was the result of an appropriation of lands by the Continental Congress in the year 1776, and enlarged four years later, to all who had fought or would fight for independence; the grants varying in size from 100 to 1,100 acres each, according to the various ranks in the army. But this appropriation was made without determining where the lands so appropriated were, or might be located. Before the army had been disbanded at Newburgh, therefore, the officers and soldiers before mentioned petitioned Congress to locate their promised bounties somewhere between Lake Erie and the Ohio River. They spoke of that tract as "not being the property of any particular state of the Union," and also as "suitable and of sufficient extent to form a distinct government, in time to be admitted as one of the Confederated States of America." This petition was forwarded by General Putnam to General Washington for presentation to Congress, with a long letter detailing the advantages that would accrue to the whole country from the founding of a colony in the Ohio Valley. Washington labored earnestly both at Princeton and Annapolis to secure favorable action by Congress upon this petition; but that body was not ready to regard that territory as the common property of the several states—which had hitherto possessed nothing in common except an enemy—nor would it recognize the individual state claims; and as some of the new states had large amounts of territory of their own in the market, the request of these soldiers met with strong opposition and even ridicule. So the project failed.

But General Putnam and some of his associates were not to be turned from their purpose. They foresaw the value and importance of the Ohio country and did not abandon the idea of starting a state. The second and successful plan for making the first settlement upon national ground, and the germ of the present state of Ohio, began with an all-night conference between General Putnam and General Benj. Tupper, at the residence of the former, in Rutland, Mass., January 9, 1786. At that meeting they drew up and signed a request addressed to all who were interested in Western emigration, to choose delegates in the several counties of Massachusetts on February 15, to meet at Boston on the following 1st of March. This call was published in the Boston papers of January 25th, 1786, under the head of "Information," and announced the object of the proposed meeting to be "to raise a fund in Continental certificates for the sole purpose of buying lands in the Western territory and making a settlement."

At the appointed time eleven delegates, representing eight counties, met at the "Bunch of Grapes," tavern, Boston, and organized by electing General Putnam president and Winthrop Sargent secretary. This was the first Ohio Society. It was called the "Ohio Company of Associates," and its officers were to be five directors, a treasurer and a secretary. The fund to be raised was not to exceed a million dollars in certificates, each share to consist of one thousand dollars in certificates and ten dollars in gold or silver for incidental expenses. No person was to hold more than five shares or to represent more than twenty shares. The land, when purchased, was to be divided and apportioned by lot. In these respects the company was somewhat different from a syndicate of the present day.

At the expiration of one year, which was allowed for obtaining subscriptions, a second meeting, called in the same manner as the first, was held at Brackett's Tavern, Boston, when it appeared that two hundred and fifty shares had been subscribed and that many were restrained from subscribing "only by the uncertainty of obtaining a sufficient tract, collectively, for a great settlement." Thereupon, three directors, General Putnam, Gen. Samuel H. Parsons and Rev. Dr. Cutler, were elected to make immediate application to Congress for a purchase of lands. This board employed Dr. Cutler to make a contract with Congress for a tract of land in the great "Western Territory of the Union." In the following July he went to New York (where Congress was then sitting) for that purpose, arriving there the evening of the 5th. An ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory was then pending, awaiting its third reading; and it awaits its third reading still. For two or three days after Dr. Cutler's offer to purchase lands was made, a new committee on an ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Carrington, Lee, Dane, Kean and Smith, who reported an ordinance on the 11th, which was read the second time on the 12th, the third time on the 13th, and passed. This was the famous ordinance of 1787, to which the nation's greatest men have vied with each other in attempts to give sufficient praise. In his "History of the Constitution," Mr. Bancroft says: "Before the Federal Convention," then in session at Philadelphia, "had referred its resolutions to a committee of detail, an interlude in Congress was shaping the character and destiny of the United States of America. Sublime and humane and eventful in the history of mankind as was the result, it will not take many words to tell how it was brought about. For a time wisdom and peace and justice dwelt among men, and the great ordinance which could alone give continuance to the Union came in serenity and stillness. Every man that had a share in it seemed to be moved by an invisible hand to do just what was wanted of him; all that was wrongfully undertaken fell to the ground to wither by the wayside; whatever was needed for the happy completion of the mighty work arrived opportunely, and just at the right moment moved into its place." On the same subject Mr. Webster said: "We are accustomed to praise the law-givers of antiquity; we help to perpetuate the name of Solon and Lycurgus; but I doubt whether one single law of any law-giver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked and lasting character than the ordinance of 1787."

Upon the adoption of this ordinance, although the land ordinance of 1785 directing sales to be made through the loan commissioners of the different states was still in force, Congress directed the board of treasury of the United States to accept the proposition of the Ohio Company made by Dr. Cutler; and the board sold him fifteen hundred thousand acres of land at two-thirds of a dollar per acre, one-half to be paid when the contract was closed and the land to be conveyed when the payment should be complete. The contract was executed October 27, 1787, and was signed by Samuel Osgood and Arthur Lee of the board of treasury, and Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent of the Ohio Company. This contract, written upon parchment—the first ever executed by the United States—together with the deed for the lands, executed May 10, 1792, and signed by George Washington, president, and Thomas Jefferson, secretary of state, are now carefully treasured in the library of Marietta College.

The location selected by Dr. Cutler was at the mouth of the Muskingum River, between the 7th and 17th ranges of townships, counting westward from Pennsylvania, and extending from the Ohio River northward far enough to include the requisite number of acres.

The final preparations of the Company before starting to its new home were made at a meeting held at Brackett's Tavern, November 23d, 1787. General Putnam was elected superintendent of the emigrant party, which consisted of forty-eight men in two divisions. Seven days later the first division, containing twenty-two men, started from Danvers, Mass., in charge of Major Haffield White. The second division, under command of General Putnam, left Hartford, Conn., January 1, 1788. The journey was both difficult and tedious; when they reached the mountains the roads were found to be impassable by wagons on account of the great depths of snow. They were compelled to construct sleds and sledges with which to transport their baggage and provisions over the Alleghanies. Thus the raw material of the new state, if not the star of empire, was wended westward. The two divisions of the party united at Sumrill's Ferry on the Youghioghenny river, about thirty miles above the site of Pittsburg, the one having been fifty-four days on the way and the other forty-five. About six weeks were spent at this place in constructing boats for the completion of their journey. Their fleet, when completed, consisted of one boat about forty-five feet long and twelve feet wide, which they facetiously named "The Mayflower," and a flat boat and three canoes. On the first of April they started down the river, reaching their destination at the mouth of the Muskingum April 7, 1788, where they landed about noon and in the rain. This may be called the first instance of infant baptism north-west of the Ohio river. The tradition that Ohio derives her nickname from the belief that a buckeye tree, being the most easily cut, was the first to fall by the hands of a settler, is probably not true.

The pioneers were heartily welcomed by a tribe of the Delawares, which happened to be encamped near, and were greatly encouraged by the contrast in the appearance of vegetation between the region they had left a few days before, where the snows still lingered, and that of the bottoms of the Ohio, which at once furnished food for their hungry horses. The survey of their lands and the erection of houses were immediately begun, giving abundant proof that they had come to stay. A letter from one of their number to a friend in Worcester, Mass., dated May 18th, about six weeks after their arrival, says: "This country, for fertility of soil and pleasantness of situation, not only exceeds my expectations, but exceeds any part of Europe or America that I was ever in. We have started twenty buffaloes in a drove. Deer are as plenty as sheep with you. Beaver and otter are abundant. I have known one man to catch twenty or thirty of them in a single night. We have already planted a field of one hundred and thirty acres in corn." A letter dated July 9th contains the surprising statement that "the corn has grown nine inches every twenty-four hours for two or three days past." This corn was planted among the deadened timber and of course received little attention during the growing season, although the woods were comparatively free from underbrush, owing to the very wise practice of the Indians which white men have not yet learned, of burning their forests over every Autumn. The yield was about thirty bushels per acre, which is not very much below what the present owners of the same lands with all their improvements produce on the same number of acres.

The first formal meeting of the directors and agents of the company, west of the mountains, was held on the 2d of July, 1788, when the new settlement, which had as yet been known as "The Muskingum," was, by a formal resolution, named "Marietta," in honor of the beautiful though unfortunate Queen of France. It was believed that much of the very substantial friendship of that country for the Americans was due to her influence with the king.

The first Fourth of July was not allowed to pass without proper celebration. Thirteen cannons were fired in the morning from Ft. Harmar, and a like number in the evening. The municipal laws were written and published by being posted upon the smooth bark of a beech tree. A sumptuous dinner was served upon the bank of the Muskingum, at which fourteen toasts, at least, were drunk. Gen. James M. Varnum, who had been added to the board of directors, delivered an oration, which was the first political address ever delivered within the present borders of the state. A number of others have been delivered since. The first one was published, by request, before the close of that year, by Peter Edes, of Newport, R. I., and compares favorably with any that have followed.

On the 14th of July General St. Clair arrived at Ft. Harmar, and the following day at 5 p. m. he was formally received by the citizens of the territory, when his own commission as governor, together with those of three newly appointed federal judges, was publicly read. These commissions were dated the 1st of the preceding February. The judges were Generals Parsons and Varnum and John Cleve Symmes, who had not yet arrived.

Work was now being rapidly pushed by General Putnam upon "Campus Martius," the famous garrison, consisting of a square inclosed by bullet-proof, two-story log houses. The space within was 144 feet square, and in the center was a well 80 feet deep. The house at each corner was larger and one story higher than the rest, from which observations might be had in every direction. In the house at the northwest corner, on the 2d of September, 1788, was held the first court. The people attended in a procession, preceded by the sheriff with a drawn sword. It was a court of common pleas and was opened with prayer. The commissions of the three judges, Generals Putnam and Tupper and Col. Archibald Gray, were then read, and Paul Fearing was admitted to the bar, thereby becoming the first lawyer in the territory. But to the credit of the people, be it said, no case, either civil or criminal, was brought before the court at its first session. In the same place, on the 20th of July, the first sermon preached in the territory to white men was delivered by Rev. William Broeck.

In the course of the year 1788 eighty-four men with several women and children were added to the settlement, making the whole number nearly two hundred. At the close of that year there was not a single white family within the present borders of the state except those in this settlement. As early as 1762 the famous Moravian missionaries gathered a number of Indians into a settlement on the Tuscarawas, but it was broken up by the massacre of the Indians in 1782. Fort Laurens was built in 1778 by General McIntosh, but abandoned the following year, and Colonel Harmar, with most of his officers at the fort across the Muskingum bearing his name, were now members of the Ohio company. Thus one of the few individual attempts to gain a foothold in the territory had been successful.

The colony grew rapidly until the outbreak of the Indian war. During the year 1789, 152 men and 57 families were added to its number. The following year nearly four hundred French emigrants arrived, for whom houses and food were provided without pay. On January 2, 1791, nearly three years after the settlement was begun, the Indians made their first attack, killing fourteen persons and carrying five into captivity. This was the beginning of the Indian war, which continued for four years. It was a sad reverse of fortune, as few of the settlers had any considerable store of provisions or money to support their families, nor could they go on tilling their lands during a state of hostilities. The attack was prudently made upon those settlers farthest up the Muskingum river, who were least able to defend themselves. Those at Marietta, owing to the wise foresight of General Putnam, had a safe refuge in Campus Martius, which probably saved the colony from total destruction. In all of its buildings there were seventy-two rooms, sufficient in case of necessity for eight hundred people. "For four years the pioneers lived within this garrison, in a condition very similar to a besieged city. Although they were not closely infested by an Indian army, no one could leave the walls of the fort without hazard from the rifle or tomahawk of an Indian, as they were continually lurking around and watching for the unwary white man, several of whom fell victims to their temerity in venturing too far from their defenses." In the prosecution of this war the colony spent about $11,000 of its own money, for which it was never reimbursed. The war, too, turned the tide of emigration down the Ohio, so that large numbers who would otherwise have added to its strength passed it by.

Something should be said about the character of the men by whom and of whom the state of Ohio was founded. If she has been fortunate in her prosperity, she was no less happy in her origin. Among the many distinguished men who were members of the Ohio Company, but who never became actual settlers, were Hamilton and Dexter, the first and third secretaries of the treasury; Henry Knox, the first secretary of war; three governors of Massachusetts, of whom one was also a vice-president of the United States; a governor of Rhode Island and a governor of Connecticut; a United States senator from Connecticut, a postmaster-general under the Continental Congress, an associate justice of the United States supreme court, and a president of Harvard College.

And of those actively connected with the first settlement there were many eminent and at least two remarkable men, Rufus Putnam and Manasseh Cutler. General Putnam spent no less than eighteen years of the prime of his life fighting for the soil upon which he spent his last thirty-six years. At the age of seventeen he abandoned his occupation to serve as a private in the French war; as a colonel in the war of the Revolution he was charged with the defense of New York by fortifications; constructed the fortifications at West Point and commanded a regiment in General Wayne's brigade until victory was won; and finally as a brigadier-general, he was successful in a long and bitter conflict with the Indians, closing his military services with Wayne's army at Detroit. His sword is now one of the choicest relics in Marietta, where he died in 1824. As leader of the pioneers he insured their success. His heart was not a whit fainter nor his hand a bit weaker than that of Miles Standish.

Dr. Cutler was a highly educated man, a graduate of Yale College, and a member of various philosophical societies. His agency in securing the adoption of the "immortal ordinance" is well established. The similarity of that ordinance to the constitution of Massachusetts indicates that it was written mainly by himself. To him, therefore, we are largely indebted for that "interlude" which "shaped the character and destiny of the United States," and that law of which some of the "marked and lasting effects" are the addition of twenty-five states to the Union and slavery in none. A man more wise or diplomatic than Dr. Cutler at that time was not needed.

In his "Pioneer History" Dr. Hildreth says: "Had the settlement at Marietta commenced like most others in the western country since that period, it would doubtless have been broken up and destroyed. But the wisdom and firmness of the agents and directors, backed by the counsel of so many old officers of the Revolution, with General Putnam at their head, preserved it in safety amidst all the difficulties and dangers that surrounded it." In a letter dated June, 1788, Washington wrote: "No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at the Muskingum. Information, property and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community." A short time before he had written to Lafayette, "Congress has sold in the year past a pretty large quantity of lands on the Ohio for public securities and thereby diminished the public debt considerably; many of your military acquaintances, such as Generals Putnam, Parsons and Varnum, Colonels Tupper, Sproat and Sherman, with many more, propose settling there. From such beginnings much may be expected."

So the state of Ohio is not to be blamed for becoming great.

THE SECOND SETTLEMENT IN OHIO AT CINCINNATI

By HON. WARREN HIGLEY

A Paper Read Before the Ohio Society of New York, November 8, 1886

THE war of the Revolution was over. The treaty of Paris had been signed. The people of the new-born Republic were addressing themselves to the amicable adjustment and settlement of foreign and interstate questions—to devising and working out a form of government, wiser, juster, freer and stronger than that under the Articles of Confederation—to strengthening national credit, and to the development of the vast natural resources of the new nation. Under the treaty of Paris the United States had received from England's king his title to all that territory stretching from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi, and from the Ohio river to the great lakes, a territory 241,421 square miles in extent, nearly twice as large as that of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales combined; with great variety of climate; with marvelous productiveness of soil; with inexhaustible mines of coal and iron and copper and salt; with numerous broad and navigable rivers and lakes winding through its vast area and along either side of it, and flowing for thousands of miles to the ocean and the gulf, inviting the future commerce of the world to their shores.

This new acquisition of territory to that of the original colonial states soon came into the possession and control of the nation and naturally attracted the attention of Congress and the public spirited citizens of the East to its importance and development. It seemed to offer to the government the means for payment of the national debt, which at that time hung like a pall over the people.

Nor was this territory at that time a terra incognita. For more than a hundred years had the indomitable Jesuit missionaries traversed its wilds and held aloft the emblem of the religion of Christ for conversion of the savage tribes; and France had erected a line of fortifications to protect the territory against the invasion of her English enemies.

But no settlements had been made save those on the shores of the northern lakes, and a few within the territory, and these were established for missionary purposes, to aid in the work of converting the Indians to Christianity, rather than for permanent settlement and the introduction of a new civilization. It now remained for the citizens of the new republic to go in, purchase from the natives, and take possession and build up, on this wide border-land homes and free local government, and a prosperity before unsurpassed, under the beneficent Ordinance of 1787.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

THE MIAMI PURCHASE

On the 29th of August, 1787, John Cleves Symmes, of Morristown, New Jersey, being encouraged by the resolutions of Congress of the 23d and 27th of July previous, stipulating the conditions of a transfer of federal lands on the Scioto and Muskingum rivers unto Winthrop Sargent and Manasseh Cutler, Esquires, and their associates, of New England, petitioned Congress, on behalf of the citizens of the United States westward of Connecticut, to direct that a contract be made with him by the Hon. Commissioners of the Treasury Board, for him and his associates, similar to the contract with Sargent and Cutler, for the purchase of the tract lying north of the Ohio river and between the Great and Little Miami rivers. Upon this application Congress, on the 3d of October, 1787, authorized the Treasury Board to enter into a contract with said Symmes for the purchase of the tract, to be known as the Miami Purchase, and on the 26th day of November following Judge Symmes issued a proclamation "To the respectable Public" setting forth the terms and conditions of purchase and settlement and inviting co-operation. The price required to be paid was two-thirds of a dollar per acre, in liquidated certificates, exclusive of the interest due on such certificates, to be paid by the purchaser on the receipt of his land warrant.

After the 1st of May following the price was to be raised to $1 per acre, and after November 1st to a still higher price, if the country should be settled as fast as was expected.

General Knox, the secretary of war, had assured him of his friendly disposition to support the settlers against the Indians by replacing a garrison of federal troops in the fort which was still remaining on the land at the mouth of the Great Miami, and this he claimed would greatly facilitate the settlement and in some measure secure safety to the first adventurers.

In this proclamation Judge Symmes announced that he reserved certain rights as follows:

"The subscriber hopes that the respectable public will not think it unreasonable in him, when he informs them that the only privilege which he reserves for himself, as a small reward for his trouble in this business, is the exclusive right of electing or locating that entire township which will be the lowest down in the point of land formed by the Ohio and Great Miami rivers, and those three fractional parts of townships which may be north, west and south, between such entire township and the waters of the Ohio and Great Miami. This point of land the subscriber intends paying for himself, and thereon to lay out a handsome town plot, with eligible streets and lots of 60 feet wide in front and rear and 120 feet deep, every other lot of which shall be given freely to any person who shall first apply for the same" on condition of improvement and occupancy within two years after purchase, and to continue for a consecutive period of three years.

The purchase money for the whole tract was not paid within the time stipulated, but by special act of Congress passed in 1792, a patent was issued to

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

John Cleves Symmes and associates for so much of the lands as he might be able to pay for, and on settlement with the treasury department in 1794 it was found that he had paid for 248,540 acres of land, for which he received a patent September, 1794. But as the law of 1792 provided for granting a college township for the use of the Miami Purchase, this with other reserved sections were included in the patent; so that the boundaries described in it contained 311,682 acres.

SETTLEMENTS

The first attempt toward the establishment of a permanent settlement in this purchase was made in the early fall of 1788.

Matthias Denman, of Springfield, New Jersey, had purchased from Judge Symmes the fractional section lying on the banks of the Ohio opposite the mouth of the Licking river, and the section adjoining on the north.

On the 22d day of September, 1788, Matthias Denman, Colonel Robert Patterson, of Lexington, Ky., and John Filson, a surveyor, in company with Judge Symmes, Israel Ludlow, of Morristown, New Jersey, who had been appointed by Surveyor-General Hutchins to make a survey of the purchase, and others, arrived at the present site of Cincinnati for the purpose of observation, and of laying out a town opposite the mouth of the Licking river, in accordance with the plan previously agreed upon. Patterson and Filson had taken each a one-third interest in Denman's purchase, and they had named their proposed town Losanteville (Le-os-ant-e-ville) the village opposite the mouth, a name said to have been suggested by an imaginative Frenchman.

Ludlow's business was to survey the Miami Purchase, Filson's to lay out the town according to the plat agreed upon. By the terms of the contract the east line of Denman's purchase was to be twenty miles from the mouth of the Great Miami, and he required that this should first be established. While Denman and Ludlow were engaged in this work, Symmes, Patterson, Filson and others made an excursion into the wilderness. Filson separated from the party, or got lost, and was never after heard of. The natural inference was that he was surprised and slain by the Indians. The party at once returned to the site of the new town with this sad news, and such was the consternation and fear from the loss of Filson that they abandoned their work, and the whole party went back to Limestone, now Maysville, Ky.

Here Denman and Patterson took Ludlow into their enterprise with one-third interest, in the place of John Filson, and he was to make the survey of the town. A new plat was made, modeled after that of Filson's, and the name of the future city was changed to Cincinnati. So that while the young settlement was for some time popularly known as Losanteville, it never officially had any other name than Cincinnati.

Denman's purchase amounted to about eight hundred acres, for which he paid five shillings per acre in continental certificates, worth only five shillings on the pound or 15d. per acre, £50 for the whole. While the Denman party were perfecting their plans and gathering recruits at Limestone to make their settlement a permanent thing, Major Benjamin Stites, with a party of eighteen or twenty associates, landed near the mouth of the Little Miami river, near the present site of Columbia, about five miles above the site of Cincinnati, in November, 1788, built a block-house for protection against the Indians and made a settlement which prospered well, and for two or three years had more inhabitants than any other in the purchase.

Among these first settlers were Colonel Spencer, Major Gano, Judge Goforth, Francis Dunlavy, Judge Foster, Colonel Brown, Major Kibby, Rev. John Smith, Mr. Hubble, Captain Flinn, Jacob White and John Riley, all men of energy and character, well fitted to battle successfully with the hardships and dangers of this wild country.

On the 24th of December, 1788, Denman, Patterson and others to the number of about twelve or fifteen, landed a second time at the site of their proposed town opposite the mouth of the Licking, and proceeded to provide the necessary means for shelter and protection against the treacherous Indians.

A third party under Judge Symmes left Limestone January 29, 1789, and after a perilous voyage, down the Ohio, consequent upon the floating ice, reached North Bend in the early part of February, where he proposed to lay out and build up the important town of the purchase.

Thus were the three settlements begun that were afterwards to be welded together and become the Queen City of the West.

On application of Judge Symmes, General Harmar, in command at Marietta had sent Captain Kearsy with forty-eight rank and file to protect the settlers in the Miami country. The soldiers landed at North Bend, and finding no fort fit for occupancy and having no tools with which to erect one, they soon after left the settlement and proceeded down the river to Louisville where they found comfortable accommodation with other troops.

The Judge wrote to the commandant at Louisville complaining bitterly of the action of Captain Kearsy, whereupon a company of seventeen or eighteen men under command of Ensign Luce were dispatched to North Bend, with instructions to select a suitable site for erecting a block-house or fort for the protection of the Miami settlements. They arrived promptly and the settlers were thus assured of safety.

The Ensign seemed to feel that he was charged with the duty of erecting fortifications at such place as was best calculated to afford the most extensive protection to all the Miami settlers, and in spite of the persistent entreaties and opposition of Judge Symmes he left the Bend and with his command went to Cincinnati, where he at once selected a favorable place and commenced to build strong military works. This military movement was followed by very important results. The settlers at the Bend realizing the dangers to which they were exposed, in the absence of trained soldiers, soon removed to Cincinnati, and the hopes for the future city, so fondly dreamed of, were thus destroyed.

The following summer, 1789, Major Doughty arrived at Cincinnati with one hundred and forty troops from Fort Harmar and, approving the military judgment of Ensign Luce, began the construction of Fort Washington, the most extensive and important military work in the territory.

While it is no doubt the simple fact that the reason for building Fort Washington on the site where it was erected, on the first shelf, fifty feet above low water and almost opposite the mouth of the Licking, was purely a military one, being near the place where the old Indian trail from the lakes down through the Miami country crossed the Ohio and led into Kentucky and the South, and that this location was by far the best for the protection of the Miami settlers, still there is a romantic story connected with the location of this site, related by Judge Burnett in his "Notes on the Northwest Territory," that may be of interest. It is this:

"It was said and believed that while officer Luce was looking out very leisurely for a suitable site on which to build a block-house he formed the acquaintance of a beautiful, black-eyed female, who called forth his most assiduous and tender attention. She was the wife of one of the settlers at the Bend. Her husband saw the danger to which he would be exposed if he remained where he was, and therefore removed to Cincinnati.

"When the gallant commander discovered that the object of his admiration had changed her residence he began to think that the Bend was not an advantageous situation for a military work. This opinion he communicated to Judge Symmes, who strongly opposed it. His reasoning, however, was not as persuasive as the sparkling eyes of the fair dulcinea. He visited Cincinnati, found the military position there superior to that at the Bend, and commenced the building of a block-house."

That movement, produced by a cause whimsical, and apparently trivial in itself, was attended with results of the greatest importance.

It settled the question whether North Bend or Cincinnati was to be the great commercial town of the Miami country.

"The incomparable beauty of a Spartan dame produced a ten years' war, which terminated in the destruction of Troy; and the irresistible charms of another woman transferred the commercial emporium of Ohio from the place where it had been commenced to the place where it now is. If this captivating Helen had remained at the Bend the garrison would have been erected there, population, capital and business would have continued there, and there would have been the Queen City of the West."

Upon such slender threads hang the fate of cities and nations.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES

The professions of friendship on the part of the Indians made in the winter of 1788-89, under the treaty of Fort Harmar, were of short duration. The lives and property of the settlers were insecure. Acts of violence and murder followed in quick succession. The settlement of Major Stites, at Columbia, was plundered; an attack was made upon the Bend and one of the settlers there was killed. Hunt, Cutler, Freeman, Truman, Hardin, and many others were assassinated not long after. The protecting influence of

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Fort Washington was circumscribed within narrow limits, and the utter extermination of the Miami settlement was seriously threatened.

On the 1st of October, 1790, General Harmar, with 1,300 men, mostly undisciplined militia, started north from Fort Washington an expedition against the Indian villages. When within forty miles of them he learned they were unoccupied, and immediately sent forth a detachment of 600 men to destroy them. The villages were burned to the ground, and the corn and fruit trees were utterly destroyed. The expedition returned to the main body, when General Harmar sent one-third of his troops back, under Colonel Hardin, to find and engage the enemy. They found the enemy and were badly defeated and cut to pieces. The survivors and the remainder of the army hastened their retreat to Fort Washington, followed and harassed by the victorious enemy. The expedition was a failure, and the savages were naturally more hostile than before.

The following year General St. Clair set out from Cincinnati with an army of 2,300 men, determined to put a stop to the Indian hostilities. On his way up the Miami country he built Forts Hamilton and Jefferson, about forty miles apart. But misfortune attended the expedition from the start. When twenty-seven miles beyond Fort Jefferson, on the morning of the 4th of November, 1791, the American army was attacked by Indians in great force, and was defeated with heavy loss. Among the killed were the gallant Major-General Butler, Colonel Oldham and Major Ferguson.

The settlements naturally had few accessions while subject to threatening dangers from an infuriated foe. This uncertain condition continued until the spring of 1794, when Gen. Anthony Wayne, with 2,000 regulars and 1,500 mounted volunteers from Kentucky, met the enemy in their own country, at Fallen Timbers, a few miles above the present Maumee City, and defeated them. He maintained every advantage gained and rendered his fortifications impregnable to his wily foe. The Indian chiefs gradually came to a realizing sense of their inability to succeed against the army of General Wayne and began to consider the terms of peace that had already been urged by the United States, and their deliberations finally resulted in the Treaty of Greenville, signed on the 3d day of August, 1795, settling a permanent peace with all the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio River, and giving security to the settlers.

PEACE

It is not difficult to imagine with what joy the suffering pioneers at Cincinnati hailed the proclamation of peace. It was no longer necessary for them to attend divine service with loaded rifles by their side. They could now extend and cultivate their fields beyond the range of the Fort and the block-house.

The white population of the whole northwestern territory, including all ages and both sexes, was, at the close of 1795, only 15,000. In 1800, by the census then taken by the authority of Congress, the number was 45,365.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Authorities differ as to the population of Cincinnati in 1795, but it probably fell considerably short of 500. In 1800 it is given at 750; 1810, 2,540; 1820, 9,602; 1830, 46,338; 1840, 54,851. Cincinnati became a city in 1819.

Prior to the Treaty of Greenville, the improvements of Cincinnati were few, and of anything but a permanent character. Fort Washington was the principal object of interest and was located between Third and Fourth streets produced east of Eastern Row, now Broadway, which was then a two-pole alley, and was the eastern boundary of the town as originally laid out. Fort Washington was evacuated in 1804 and the troops transferred to the New Port Barracks. Colonel Sargent, secretary of the territory, had a convenient frame house, on the north side of Fourth street, immediately behind the fort. On the east side of the fort Dr. Allison, the surgeon-general of the army, had a plain frame dwelling, in the centre of a large cultivated garden, called Peach Grove.

The Presbyterian church, built in 1792, stood on Main street. Here the Rev. James Kemper was installed October 23d of that year. It was a substantial frame building about 30x40 feet, enclosed by clapboards, but neither lathed, plastered nor ceiled. The floor was of boat plank, laid loosely on the sleepers; the seats were of the same material, supported by blocks of wood. There was a breastwork of unplanned cherry boards, called the pulpit, behind which the clergyman stood on a piece of plank resting on blocks of wood. In that humble edifice the pioneers and their families assembled stately for public worship; and during the continuance of the war they always attended with loaded rifles by their sides. The frame school house stood on the north side of Fourth street, opposite where St. Paul's church lately was. A room in the tavern of George Avery, near the frog pond, at the corner of Main and Fifth streets, had been rented for the accommodation of the courts, and as the penitentiary system had not then been adopted and Cincinnati was a seat of justice, it was ornamented with a pillory, stocks and whipping post, and occasionally with a gallows. These were all the structures of a public character then in the place, according to the authority of Judge Burnett, who took up his residence in Cincinnati in 1796.

FIRST NEWSPAPER

The first newspaper printed north of the Ohio was established at Cincinnati by William Maxwell, November 9, 1793, and named The Sentinel of the Northwest Territory. It was evidently non-partisan in its character, with the motto "Open to all Parties—Influenced by None."

It was printed on a half sheet, royal quarto size, and naturally had a very limited circulation.

At a legislative session held at Cincinnati in the summer of 1795, the governor and judges, discovering that their enactments had not been legally approved, as required by Congress, and were therefore of doubtful authority, prepared a code of laws adapted from the statutes of the original states.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

This was printed at Cincinnati by William Maxwell, in 1795, and hence was called the Maxwell Code. It was the first job of printing ever executed in the northwestern territory.

In 1799 the first regular weekly newspaper was published by Joseph Carpenter, called the Western Spy and Hamilton Gazette.

After the Treaty of Greenville, the territory was rapidly settled, and the country between the Miamies, from the Ohio up to the Mad River soon became thickly dotted with farms and abounded with evidences of a rapidly growing and abiding prosperity.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT

Under the ordinance of 1787 the people were entitled to a change of government when there should be 5,000 free males of full age in the territory. At the close of 1798 the northwest territory contained the requisite number and Governor St. Clair issued his proclamation for an election to choose representatives to a territorial legislature. The election was held accordingly and on the 16th day of September, 1799, the first territorial legislature of the northwest met at Cincinnati.

Hamilton county was represented in the first legislature by Jacob Burnett, William McMillan, John Smith, John Ludlow, Robert Benham, Aaron Cadwell and Isaac Martin, men of strong character and eminent ability.

William Henry Harrison, at that time secretary of the territory, was chosen as the delegate to the national Congress.

Judge Burnett, in speaking of the habits and character of the soldiers and citizens of Cincinnati at this period says:

“Idleness, drinking and gambling prevailed in the army to a greater extent than it has done at any subsequent period.”

This may be attributed to the fact that they had been several years in the wilderness, cut off from all society but their own, with but few comforts or conveniences at hand, and no amusements but such as their own ingenuity could invent.

Libraries were not to be found; men of literary minds, or polished manners, were rarely met with; and they had long been deprived of the advantages of modest, accomplished female society, which always produces a salutary influence on the feelings and moral habits of men. Thus situated, the officers were urged by an irresistible impulse to tax their wits for expedients to fill up the chasms of leisure, after a full discharge of their military duties; and as is too frequently the case in such circumstances, the bottle, the dice box and the card table were among the expedients resorted to, because they were the nearest at hand and the most easily procured.

It is a distressing fact, that a very large proportion of the officers under General Wayne, and subsequently under General Wilkinson, were hard drinkers. Harrison, Clark, Shomberg, Ford, Strong and a few others, were the only exceptions.

As a natural consequence, the citizens indulged in the same practices and formed the same habits. As a proof of this it may be stated that when Mr. Burnett came to the bar there were nine resident lawyers engaged in the practice, of whom he was for many years the only survivor. They all became confirmed sots and descended to premature graves, excepting his brother, whose life was terminated by a rapid consumption in the summer of 1801.

I am happy to know that the character of the Cincinnati bar has radically changed in this respect since those early days.

NAVIGATION OF THE OHIO

The original mode of navigation down the Ohio was by flat-boats, impelled by sail and oar, with the aid of the current.

The pioneer from the east came over the mountains at first with pack-horses to carry his goods, and later in the Pennsylvania wagon to Pittsburg, and there took a flat-boat and floated down the river to his destination. Up to 1795 they were exposed to the attacks of hostile savages from either shore.

In 1794 a line of two keel boats, with bullet proof covers and port-holes, provided with cannon and small arms, was established between Cincinnati and Pittsburg, making the trip once in four weeks. The brawny muscle and sinew of crew and passengers furnished the power for propulsion; and so, for several years, was the traffic and commerce of enterprising Cincinnati carried on from Pittsburg to New Orleans, and up the tributaries of the Ohio and the Mississippi by the pole, the oar and the current.

It was a necessity during this period, and a custom for many years after, for traders to load their large flat-boat at Cincinnati, float with the current to New Orleans, dispose of their cargo and boat, and walk back.

In 1811, Fulton and Livingston established a shipyard at Pittsburg and built the "Orleans," as an experimental boat, the first ever placed on our western waters. This boat had a stern wheel and masts; her first trip from Pittsburg to New Orleans was made in the winter of 1812.

In 1816 Cincinnati began to build steamboats and to trade with the most distant parts of the Mississippi valley.

Cincinnati's remarkable growth is due to her favorable situation for commerce, and the energy and business push of her pioneer citizens. She became the mart of a vast commerce and the distributing point of a large territory depending upon her for supplies.

The voyages to distant places were now made in as many days as it had taken weeks; and suddenly 30,000 miles of river coast opened to this young queen city a commerce and traffic as extensive as if she had been placed on the shores of the Mediterranean or the Pacific. New Orleans at 1,500 miles distant, and the tributaries of the Missouri at thousands, were as accessible to her as Rome was to ancient Alexandria.

Nor were the advantages of Cincinnati and her early and rapid growth due alone to the remarkable river whose commerce she so largely controlled.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

FAVORABLE LOCATION

The site upon which the city is built is peculiarly favorable to comfort and health. It lies on a natural plateau, through which the Ohio passes from the southeast to the southwest. This plain is nearly twelve miles in circumference, and is bisected by the river into nearly equal parts. On the north half is Cincinnati and on the south are Covington and Newport, separated by the Licking River. This great plain is almost entirely surrounded by hills three hundred feet in height, forming one of the most beautiful natural amphitheatres to be found anywhere on the continent, from whose hilltops may be seen the splendid panorama of the cities below, with the winding Ohio, its steamers and barges and incessant movements along its shores. No other large city of the United States affords such a variety of position and scenery. It is one which a painter would have chosen for its beauty, and a shrewd mechanic for the utmost facilities of building, of water and of drainage.

The growth and commanding influence of a city depend more upon the energy, faith and wisdom of its citizens than upon the most favored gifts of nature. Fortunately for Cincinnati, her early pioneers were men and women of great energy and force of character. They established manufactories, fostered and built up an extensive commerce, opened and sustained large wholesale houses, and made Cincinnati for many years the New York of the northwest. Nor did they neglect the still more important matters of education, religion and culture. In these things they held equal rank with the older civilization of the eastern cities.

The public schools of Cincinnati were the first in the United States into which was introduced a graded system of instruction.

In all the growth and prosperity of this metropolis of Ohio, we discern the beneficent influence of her hardy pioneers whose stalwart characters sowed the seed and nurtured the tender plant for the abundant fruitage of after years.

All honor, then, to the enterprising spirit, patient courage, lofty faith and energetic character of those who in the summer and fall of 1788 made the second permanent settlement of Ohio, at Cincinnati.

THE ORDINANCE OF 1787 AND THE WAR OF 1861

By GENERAL WAGER SWAYNE

An Address Delivered before the Ohio Society of New York, September 8, 1890

THE fruits of the late Civil War are gathered and preserved, so far as its direct effect upon our own government are concerned, in three short paragraphs which are amendatory of the federal constitution. They were adopted soon after the war, and with the express intention to make its results secure.

There have been fifteen amendments to that instrument since it was adopted on the first Wednesday in March, 1789. The first ten were adopted as one, immediately after the original indenture, and under circumstances which made them really part of the original transaction. Another followed within ten years, and the next one five years later. Then there were sixty years without a change.

The three amendments which followed the last war are therefore known as the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth. The first of them was adopted in 1865, the next in 1868 and the last in 1870.

The first of these amendments provides that:

“Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.”

The second provides that:

“All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.”

The third provides that:

“The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.”

Each of them, in addition, provides that Congress, or “The Congress,” as the constitution designates our national legislature, may enforce its provisions “by appropriate legislation.”

There are subsidiary sections of the fourteenth amendment, which regulate representation in Congress, prohibit men from holding office (until pardoned) who having, before the war, taken an oath of office to support the constitution of the United States, were not deterred by that fact from attempting to overthrow that constitution; prohibit questioning the validity of the public debt incurred in suppressing the rebellion; and prohibit, also, the United States and every state from paying any debt incurred in aid of the rebellion.

All these, however, are of incidental or transient operation. The three clauses: inhibiting slavery; making all persons born or naturalized in the United States its citizens, and citizens of their respective states; and then assuring to the citizen the full enjoyment of all his rights and privileges; these are the substance of these three amendments to the federal constitution, and these three, when grouped together, are perceived to be one. That one is but the ripened growth of the primary enactment, which is itself an adaptation of the corresponding phrase in the eventful "Ordinance of 1787"—"There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

It will be easily remembered that by this Ordinance, enacted by Congress before the present constitution, the United States assumed jurisdiction over, and established a government for, what was then known as the Northwest Territory, comprising the whole vast area between the Ohio, the lakes, and the Mississippi, which last was at that time the western boundary of our country.

Originally applicable to but a limited area, this precept of that Ordinance is now made to apply to the whole Union; it is amplified to include all the rights of citizens, and for its honor and security its beneficiaries are endowed with the right to vote. The war was a purchase of the rights of man; these three amendments are the title deeds, and all their value rests upon this declaration: that THERE SHALL BE NEITHER SLAVERY NOR INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE, EXCEPT FOR CRIME.

It is a touching fact, when we recall how much it means, that only this should be the fruit of that great war. We personally remember how for four years it kept this country torn apart, and how it gathered and accumulated and intensified with death and desolation all of those feelings which urge upon the human heart the most vindictive retribution. One of the parties came to be in a position to inflict such retribution. The situation of the other left it nothing but submission. The years since have disclosed the scope of what was actually exacted. The historian will find no list of executions or imprisonments; no lasting confiscations or disfranchisements; no state impaired in full and equal sovereignty. Nothing, except three short amendments to the federal constitution, all securing, even to the vanquished, equal rights. Perhaps it is because of this that since that date this nation has grown so great that even the future of the world seems brighter.

This precept against slavery stands, moreover, as the final guaranty of individual freedom in this country; and even beyond this, I cannot but feel that, involved with its history are not only the origin of the late war and the final triumph of the right, but, also, as to very many of us, our own direct and personal relation to the war.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

I have not known till recently, and possibly you do not fully know, how far the officers and soldiers of the revolution were the source of life and strength of that great Ordinance, nor how their lives have by its means become involved with our own lives, nor how far that inscription came from them which is at once the basis of our liberties and the seal of our own military service.

I begin with the first official record. In a report made in March, 1792, by a congressional committee of the House of Representatives, to whom had been referred a petition from the "Ohio Company of Associates," the committee says:

"They find said Ohio Company laid its foundation in an application to the United States in Congress assembled; a copy of which marked 'No. 1' is herewith presented to the House."

The petition referred to is dated June 16, 1783, and is signed by two hundred and eighty-five officers of the Continental army. The army was at that time encamped at Newburgh in this state, waiting to be discharged whenever news should be received that the treaty of peace and independence had been formally concluded.

Of these signers seven were general officers—Knox, Putnam, Stark, Paterson, Huntington, Greaton and Dayton. Besides these, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, surgeons, majors, chaplains, paymasters, captains, lieutenants and ensigns were duly represented. One hundred and fifty-five were from Massachusetts, thirty-four from New Hampshire and forty-six from Connecticut; making two hundred and thirty-five from the New England states. Thirty-six were from New Jersey, thirteen from Maryland, and one, Captain John Doughty, of the artillery, from our own state of New York.

To me so much of interest attaches to this petition that I beg leave to present it entire.

"To His Excellency the President, and Honorable Delegates of the United States of America in Congress Assembled:

"The petition of the subscribers, officers in the continental line of the army, humbly sheweth:

"That by a resolution of the honorable Congress passed September 20, 1776, and other subsequent resolves, the officers (and soldiers engaged for the war) of the American army, who shall continue in service until the establishment of peace or in case of their dying in service, their heirs are entitled to receive certain grants of land according to their several grades, to be procured for them at the expense of the United States.

"That your petitioners are informed that that tract of country bounded north on Lake Erie, east on Pennsylvania, southeast and south on the River Ohio, west on a line beginning at that part of the Ohio which lies twenty-four miles west of the River Scioto; thence running north on a meridian line till it intersects with the River Miami (Maumee) which falls into Lake Erie; thence down the middle of that river to the lake is a tract of country not claimed as the property of or in the jurisdiction of any particular state in the Union. That this country is of sufficient extent, the land of such quality and situation, such as may induce Congress to assign and mark it out as a tract or territory suitable to form a distinct government (or colony of the United States), in time to be admitted one of the Confederate States of America.

“Wherefore, your petitioners pray that, whenever the honorable Congress shall be pleased to procure the aforesaid lands of the natives, they will make provision for the location and survey of the lands to which we are entitled within the aforesaid district; and also for all officers and soldiers who wish to take up their lands in that quarter.

“That provision also be made for a further grant of lands to such of the army as wish to become adventurers in the new government, in such quantities and on such conditions of settlement and purchase for public securities as Congress shall judge most for the interest of the intended government, and rendering it of lasting consequence to the American empire.

“And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

We have here a body of officers of the Continental army, while yet in camp, petitioning Congress “to assign and mark out a tract of territory suitable to form a distinct government (or colony of the United States), in time to be admitted one of the Confederate States of America”; and “to make provision for the location and survey of the lands to which we are entitled within the aforesaid district; and also for all officers and soldiers who wish to take up their lands in that quarter”; and, further, that upon proper conditions of settlement and purchase, provision also be made for a further grant of lands “to such of the army as may wish to become adventurers in the new government.”

In other words, here is a movement originating with officers of the Continental army, and resulting afterwards in their formal organization, which from the first contemplated the distinct and apparently exclusive settlement of a new state by officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war. In the end, they seem to have accomplished more than this, and, as I have suggested, to have left their distinct impression on that war which has associated us. Meantime, however, the earlier history of the petition is instructive and pathetic.

By the terms of confederation of the thirteen colonies, “all charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states in proportion to the value of all land within each state. * * * The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several states.” * * *

This method presupposed, and required for its effective working, that the continental Congress be cordially supported by the several legislatures, and all its requisitions promptly met. As a matter of fact the legislatures did neither. Concerning them, Washington wrote, in 1783, to General Greene at Newburgh:

“I have written almost incessantly to all the states, urging, in the most forcible terms I could make use of, the absolute necessity of complying with the requisitions of Congress in furnishing their contingents of men and money, and am unhappy to say the success of these applications has not been equal to my expectations.”

This unsatisfactory condition of affairs may have been caused by jealousy of the centralized power of Congress; it may have been that popular opinion in the colonies did not, after its first impulse, fully support the Revolutionary War; but it is clear from Washington's writings, and from those of other contemporary witnesses, that the requisitions of Congress and the obligation which it had incurred were the subject of indifference, if not of aversion, by the states. Thus, in a letter to Governor Harrison of Virginia, Washington writes:

“How well the states are provided for a continuance of the war, let their acts and policy answer. The army, as usual, is without pay—and a great part of the soldiery without shirts—and though the patience of them is equally threadbare, the states seem perfectly indifferent to their cries—in a word, if one were to hazard for them an opinion on this subject, it would be that the army had contracted such a habit of encountering difficulties and distress, and of living without money, that it would be impolitic to introduce other customs into it.”

Perhaps here is an explanation of the fact that with bare and bleeding feet the soldiers of the Continental army crossed the Delaware. In a letter to Hamilton, Washington says that to the defects of the Articles of Confederation, and to “want of power in Congress may justly be ascribed the prolongation of the war, and consequently the expense of it.” He adds: “More than half of the perplexities I have experienced in the course of my command, and almost the whole of the difficulties and distress of the army, have had their origin there.”

The disposition of the states towards Congress, its obligations and its army, did not improve when peace put the objects of the war in possession, and when the possibility of centralized control need no longer be endured as the alternative of foreign subjugation. A review of the situation, caustic, but probably just, is found in a letter to James Monroe, which was written from this city by William Grayson, of Virginia, one of the foremost members of Congress, during one of its sessions here:

“The delegates from the Eastward are for a very strong government, and wish to prostrate all ye State Legislatures, and form a general government out of ye whole, but I don't learn that ye people are with them; on the contrary, in Massachusetts they think that Government too strong, and are about rebelling again, for ye purpose of making it more democratical. In Connecticut they have rejected ye requisition for ye present year decidedly, and no man there would be elected to ye office of a constable, if he was to declare that he meant to pay a copper towards ye domestic debt. Rhode Island has refused to send members; ye cry there is for a good government after they have paid their debts in depreciated paper; first, demolish ye Philistines (i. e., their creditors) and then for propriety. N. Hampshire has not paid a shilling since peace, and does not mean to pay one to all eternity. If it was attempted to tax ye people for ye domestic debt, 500 Shays would arise in a fortnight. In N. York they pay well, because they can do it by plundering N. Jersey and Connecticut. Jersey will go great lengths from motives of revenge and interest. Pennsylvania will join, provided you let ye sessions of ye Executive of America be fixed in Philadelphia and give her other advantages in trade to compensate for ye loss of State power. I shall make no observations on ye Southern States, but I think they will be (perhaps from different motives) as little disposed to part with efficient power as any in ye Union."

It was under these circumstances, and as usual, without pay, that the army at Newburgh confronted the close of the war. The country was fairly prosperous; distress affected only its preservers. The army was not slow to see this. In January, 1783, a committee of officers presented themselves at Philadelphia and complained that "shadows have been offered us, while the substance has been gathered by others. Our situation compels us to search for the causes of our extreme poverty. * * * Our distresses are now brought to a point. We have borne all that men can bear; our property is expended; our private resources are at an end; and our friends are wearied out and disgusted with our incessant applications. * * * The army entreat that Congress, to convince the world that the independence of America shall not be placed on the ruin of any particular class of her citizens, will point out a mode for immediate redress."

The testimony of Pickering, their quartermaster-general, shows that their complaint was in no degree exaggerated:

"To hear the complaints of the officers and see the miserable condition of the soldiery is really affecting. It deeply penetrates my inmost soul to see men destitute of clothing who have risked their lives like brave fellows, having large arrears of pay due them and prodigiously pinched for provisions. It is a melancholy scene. * * * Those brave and deserving soldiers, many of whom have for six years exposed their lives to save their country, who are unhappy enough to have fallen sick, have for a month past been destitute of every comfort of life. The only diet provided for them has been beef and bread, the latter generally sour."

Out of this situation grew the movement I am attempting to review. In March, 1783, news was received in camp that, while the treaty of peace was not yet formally signed, it was definitely settled by the preliminary articles, which had been signed, that the territory westward of the colonies and extending to the Mississippi River would be ceded to the United States.

We have also seen by the petition that soon after the Declaration of

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Independence, and by other subsequent resolutions, Congress had expressly pledged grants of land to the officers and soldiers of the army, "to be procured at the expense of the United States." The United States, being now about to come into possession of this vast territory, the plan at once suggested itself to these expectant grantees to secure from Congress that their grants might be located together in that part of the territory which would be nearest their original homes, and then to settle on these lands in a body. To that end they would require for their new homes an established government. Hence, they determined also to ask leave to organize a state.

Just at this time Pickering writes:

"But a new plan is in contemplation—no less than the formation of a new state westward of the Ohio. Some of the principal officers are heartily engaged in it."

We have already seen that this project contemplated the settlement of the new state mainly, if not exclusively, by officers and soldiers of the Continental army. It seems also to have contemplated that the constitutional provisions, by which its government would be controlled, should be determined in advance by the associates with whom the project originated. We are again indebted to Pickering for a record of the "propositions for settling a new state by such officers and soldiers of the federal army as shall associate for the purpose."

Aside from such of these propositions as are repeated in the petition under review, I can pause only to notice that one of them which provides that "a constitution for the new state can be formed by the members of the association previous to their commencing the settlement, two-thirds of the associates present at a meeting duly notified for that purpose agreeing therein. The total exclusion of slavery from the state to form an essential and irrevocable part of the constitution."*

This has been well said to be the first known proposition among men to establish a government whose distinctive feature should be universal freedom. It came from those who for freedom had lost all, and we shall find their later history full of this proposition and its outcome, fuller, doubtless, than they themselves contemplated.

* This was thirteen years before slavery was abolished in New York, and twenty years before New Jersey made provision for its gradual extinction. Vermont had done so as early as 1777, others of the New England states in 1780, or soon after. The original responsibility for the presence of slavery in the remaining states is well illustrated by the history of Virginia in this respect, as summarized by Professor Miner in his Institutes. Commencing in 1699, the General Assembly, between that time and 1772, passed twenty-three enactments on that subject, each designed to exclude slaves or make their importation difficult. In 1772 the last of these laws was supplemented by a strong petition to the king not to permit "a trade of great inhumanity and dangerous to the very existence of his majesty's American dominion," in order that a few of his subjects "might reap emolument from this sort of traffic." The king's response was cruel and outrageous. Under his own hand he commanded the governor, "under pain of his highest displeasure, to assent to no law under which the importation of slaves should be in any respect prohibited or restricted." In this same year the English courts decided that a slave who set his foot on English soil was free, and a year later the Quakers in England began the agitation which ended in the abolition of the slave trade. This action of the King of England is that "inhuman use of his negative" which is referred to in the Virginia Bill of Rights.

“In the eye of reason and truth,” says Bancroft, “a colony is a better offering than a victory. It is more fit to cherish the memory of those who founded a state on the basis of democratic liberty.” These men of whom I speak first made their country offerings of victories, then founded states upon the basis of universal liberty, and afterwards, as it appears to me, controlled the fortune of that war in which we were engaged, and stamped their own inscription upon its result.

The project to form a new state at once enlisted the warm sympathy of Washington. He wrote a long letter to Theodoric Bland, a member of Congress from Virginia, and asked that Hamilton also be made acquainted with his views. Bland presently introduced an ordinance, seconded by Hamilton, too long and too elaborate to be read or discussed here, but essentially in accord with the views of the associates; except that provision was made for the ultimate division of the whole area into states. It was, moreover, conditioned upon the consent of Virginia to a change in the terms upon which that state had offered to surrender to the United States her claims to the entire territory between the Ohio, the Mississippi and the lakes.

This was referred to what was called “The Grand Committee,” and was never afterwards heard from. Doubtless the intercourse between Congress and the army which attended its introduction gave the army to better understand the opposing interests that were involved. Congress, also, meantime was paying off the army in certificates of money due, “final certificates,” as they were called, such as were issued to us under the same name at the end of our own enlistment. The difference was that these certificates would not be paid at once in full, as ours were.

They were nominally to be paid in six months, with interest at six per cent.; but they sold in the market at two and three shillings specie in the pound. Hence we find the petition urging, first, grants in fulfillment of the pledges made by resolutions of Congress, passed at different times during the war; and, second, provision for further grants “to such of the army as may wish to become adventurers in the new government, in such quantities and on such conditions of settlement and purchase with public securities” as Congress should approve.

The head of this movement, from first to last, as we shall hereafter see, was General Rufus Putnam.* The fact that the movement dates from the

* General Rufus Putnam, a man of strong mind and great character, was born in Sutton, Mass., April 9, 1738. When he was seven years old his father died. For two years thereafter he was under the care of his maternal grandfather, who gave him such opportunities to gain knowledge as he could. He learned to read, and the divine fire of zeal for learning was kindled within him. His stepfather, a rude and illiterate man, did everything in his power to quench this flame, but without success. The boy was not allowed to go to school, nor to use a candle in the night season, but he taught himself to write, and saved his pennies to buy a spelling-book and an arithmetic, which were more valuable to him than any earthly treasure.

When he was sixteen years old he was apprenticed to a millwright. He worked by day and studied by night as best he could. At the age of nineteen he was free. He immediately arrival in camp of news that the northwest territory would be ceded to the colonies, is taken from a memorandum of his own. The propositions for settlement, Pickering writes, "are in the hands of Gen. Rufus Putnam and General Huntington." It was Putnam who sent to General Washington the petition, with a long letter detailing the considerations in its favor. We shall see him more and more prominent as the project becomes tangible, until its consummation. This was not to be, however, for four long years.

Washington transmitted to Congress the petition, accompanied by Putnam's letter to him, and also himself wrote urging the movement as "the most rational and practical scheme which can be adopted by a great proportion of the officers and soldiers of our army." Already before the war he had advertised for sale "upwards of twenty thousand acres of land on the Ohio and the Great Kanawha," and urged their advantages for settlement. Once at least during the revolution, when his military staff was depressed by foreign news, and the question was put to him, "If this be true, and we are driven from the Atlantic seaboard, what, then, is to be done?" he replied:

enlisted in the army, and was a soldier in the wars against the French until the conclusion of those wars in 1760. He then resumed his trade as millwright, giving his leisure time to study, learning much about surveying and navigation. So when the war of the Revolution broke out he was a mature man, well equipped for usefulness. He was one of the first to take up arms in behalf of his country, becoming lieutenant-colonel of a Massachusetts regiment. His services as engineer were at once required, and under his direction the fortifications at Roxbury and Sewell's Point were successfully constructed. His genius led to the erection of works on Dorchester Heights, which compelled the evacuation of Boston by the British army. Soon thereafter he was sent to New York, where, as chief engineer, he was charged with the duty of laying out and overseeing the defensive works which were erected in and around that city. In January, 1778, he was at West Point, superintending the building of fortifications there, in accordance with plans which have not been essentially modified even to this day. Washington thought him to be the ablest engineer officer in the American army. During part of the war he fought valiantly at the head of two Massachusetts regiments, and before its close rose to the rank of brigadier-general.

When peace came, he found that the quiet farm life of his New England home was no longer satisfying. Besides, he longed to do something towards bettering the earthly condition of many of his fellow-soldiers, who had lost their all in the revolutionary struggle and were in deep distress. He urged upon Congress that lands should be appropriated for their use, in which plea Washington joined him, doing all in his power. The plea was at last successful. On the 31st of December, 1787, he made the following entry in his journal: "Set out from my own house, in Rutland, in the state of Massachusetts, in the service of the Ohio Company, for the mouth of the Muskingum river; wages to be $40 per month, and expense borne by the company." Of this simple farm-house the Hon. George F. Hoar writes truly: "It is a plain wooden dwelling, perhaps a little better than the average of the farmers' houses of New England of that day. Yet about which of Europe's palaces do holier memories cling? Honor and fame, and freedom and empire, and the fate of America went with him as he crossed the threshold." He was the leading spirit of the new colony, "again and again called to take the helm when storms arose." In the wars with the Indians, and in negotiating terms of peace, his services were invaluable. So great was Washington's personal appreciation of his ability, that without solicitation, in 1796, he issued to him a commission as surveyor-general of the United States. His character had already won for him the lasting friendship of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." General Putnam was greatly interested in all that concerned education. He was also a deeply religious man, recognizing in his diary many things "so evidently marked by the hand of an overruling Providence." In 1807 he drew the plan of a church, which still stands as a monument of his skill and of his interest in the work on earth of the Divine Saviour of men. He died at his home in Marietta, respected and venerated by all who knew him, on the 4th of May, 1824.

“We will retire to the Valley of the Ohio, and there we will be free.” The same thought of settlement there, and apparently also of purchase of lands by officers and soldiers who should make payment with certificates of money due, is presented again in his farewell address in which he says:

“The extensive and fertile region of the West will yield a happy asylum to those who are fond of domestic enjoyment and are seeking for personal independence. Nor is it possible to conceive that any one of the United States will prefer a national bankruptcy and a dissolution of the Union to a compliance with the requisitions of Congress and the payment of its just debts.”

A little later, September 7, 1783, in a letter to James Duane, a member of Congress, he proposed the first definite plan for the establishment of new states west of the Ohio, and with it he suggested measures for a comprehensive policy of dealing with the very serious “Indian question” of those days.

The officers’ petition arrived at precisely the wrong time. Five days after its date Congress in Philadelphia was surrounded and put in peril by mutinous unpaid Pennsylvania troops, and forthwith betook itself to Princeton. Until it came here to New York, in January, 1785, it was always a migratory and often a fugitive body from the necessities of war. It was often for long periods without a quorum.

In addition to the inopportuneness of its presentation to Congress, it was also unfortunately true that the petition was inaccurate in stating that the tract whose boundaries it defined was not claimed as the property of or within the jurisdiction of any particular state, for it was, in fact, all claimed by Virginia, and parts of it also by other states.

In 1778 Gen. George Rogers Clark,* armed with a commission from Virginia, and literally with nothing else, had, single-handed, raised troops, gathered supplies and had subdued and kept possession of the English forts at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi, near St. Louis, Cahokia, and at Vincennes, on the Ohio.

Upon this fact of possession the American commissioners at Paris had successfully asserted that the treaty of peace should cede to the United States the entire territory between the Ohio, the Mississippi and the Lakes. The

* It is a fact of importance in estimating the character and claims of General Clark on the American people that the legislature of Virginia did not furnish him with money or other means to accomplish the service they had appointed him to perform. They merely sent him a commission accompanied with power to recruit men and make contracts obligatory on the state. . . . On the credit of that document he was enabled for some time to raise supplies of provision, clothing, etc., for the sustenance and comfort of his troops, for which he drew on the commonwealth in favor of the persons who had furnished the supplies; his drafts being accompanied with such vouchers as are usually furnished on similar occasions. To his astonishment and the surprise of all who knew the facts, these drafts were dishonored, “for such reasons as could not but wound the feelings of the gallant chief who had drawn them.” He was compelled to impress supplies for the use of his troops, and “the persons whose property was taken by force commenced suits and obtained judgments against the general in the courts of the territory, on which portions of his property were attached and sold.” The cruel ingratitude of which he was the victim drove him to intemperance. His health became infirm. He suffered severely from rheumatism, which resulted in paralysis. In this way was an officer who was the foremost actor in doubling the area of his country rewarded with personal destruction.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

position at once taken by Virginia was that the United States comprised and could comprise only the states themselves, so that all lands within the United States must of necessity belong to some one of the states. For herself, her charter ran "from sea to sea, to the west and northwest." Sir Francis Drake had reported that, standing on a mountain on the Isthmus of Darien, the Atlantic and Pacific were both within his view. Probably from this fact an impression had grown up in Europe that this strip was comparatively narrow. Hence other early charters ran somewhat in the same way; and when in 1608 an expedition under orders direct from England was sent to explore the James river, a barge was sent out for Captain Newton which could be easily taken apart, and he and his company were directed "to go up the James river as far as the falls thereof (where the city of Richmond is now situated), and from thence they were to proceed, carrying their barge beyond the falls to convey them to the South Sea, and were ordered not to return without a lump of gold or the certainty of the said sea."

This charter of Virginia was not originally granted to Virginia as a colony, but to a corporation styled "The Treasurer and Company of Adventurers and Planters of the City of London for the First Colony of Virginia." They were to have:

"All those lands, countries and territories situate, lying and being in that part of America called Virginia, from the point of land called Cape or Point Comfort all along the sea coast to the northward two hundred miles, and from the said Point Comfort all along the sea coast southward two hundred miles, and all that space and circuit of land lying from the sea coast of the precinct aforesaid up into the land throughout from sea to sea, west and northwest; and also all the islands lying within one hundred miles along the coast of both seas, of the precinct aforesaid; to hold the same in free and common socage."

This charter had been taken from the London Company in 1624, by a quo warranto proceeding instituted by the king. The boundaries, however, on the north and south continued to be those of the colony, and no new western boundary had otherwise than by implication been established. Hence, the colony regarded its own area as coextensive with the original grant so far as north and south boundaries were concerned, and to the westward also, till the Spanish boundary was reached.

Arguing its own right from this basis, fortified by the fact of conquest by the troops of General Clark, Virginia passed a legislative act in October, 1778, reciting that,

—"by a successful expedition of the Virginia militia on the western side of the Ohio river, several of the British posts within the territory of this commonwealth, in the country adjacent to the Mississippi river, have been reduced, and the inhabitants have acknowledged themselves citizens thereof and taken the oath of fidelity to the same."

The same act went on to provide that —"all citizens of this commonwealth, who are already settled or shall hereafter settle on the western side of the Ohio as aforesaid, shall be included in a distinct county, which shall be called Illinois county.*

Further provision is then made for the protection and development of the country, under the auspices of a county lieutenant or commandant-in-chief, and "for supplying the said inhabitants, as well as our friendly Indians in those parts, with goods and other necessaries, either by opening a communication and trade with New Orleans or otherwise," etc.

This was succeeded by other legislative acts reserving specific areas for distribution to Virginia troops, both the militia and her own contingent in the Continental Army, and finally, in 1781, by an elaborate system for disposing of other lands to purchasers.

This provoked the remaining colonies, the state of Maryland especially forwarding to Congress resolutions that the —"extensive tract of country which lies to the westward of the frontiers of the United States had been or might be gained from the King of Great Britain or the native Indians by the blood and treasure of all, and ought, therefore, to be a common estate to be granted out on terms beneficial to all the United States."

The other states so far sympathized with this view that, after the war was closed, they held aloof, mainly on this ground, from further cementing the union of the states. Meantime, New York, "to promote the general interest and security, and more especially to accelerate the federal alliance," by an act of its legislature, relinquished all its claim.

Virginia and Connecticut thereupon did the same, but with conditions, and it was not until 1785, or two years after the petition, that the United States was in a position either to bestow the lands or authorize a plan of government.

The petition itself, indeed, recognizes the necessity of treaties with the Indians before any attempt at occupation should be made. I cannot here detail the steps by which these difficulties were removed. It was not until January, 1786, that the last of them was removed by a treaty with the Wyandottes, Delawares and Shawnees, formally ceding to the United States, except as to certain reservations, all title to the Northwest Territory.

Simultaneously with this treaty (January 25, 1786) General Rufus Putnam and Colonel Benjamin Tupper, also a signer of the petition, published in the newspapers of Boston a call headed "INFORMATION," addressed to "all officers and soldiers who have served in the late war, and who are, by a late ordinance of the Honorable Congress, to receive certain tracts of land in the Ohio country, and also all other good citizens who wish to become adventurers in that delightful region," to hold a meeting in each county on Wednesday, the fifteenth of February, to choose a delegate or delegates "to meet at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern† in Boston on Wednesday the first day of March next," in order to form "an association by the name of the Ohio Company of all such as wish to become purchasers, etc., in that country, who reside in the commonwealth of Massachusetts only, or to extend to the inhabitants of other states, as may be agreed on." It will be recalled that in 1792 a Congressional committee reported that this "Ohio Company" "laid its foundation" in the petition signed at Newburgh for a new state west of the Ohio. This was less than nine years from the date of the petition and less than five years after the company was organized. Numerous signers of the petition were at the time in Congress and in federal official place, so that personal knowledge on the subject was abundant.

Forty-seven signers of the petition became members of the company when organized. To these should be added several persons who were sons of deceased signers, and several other persons who were signers of the petition and became settlers with the rest, but did not become members of the company. Probably they had sold their certificates and were without other means of acquiring an interest. The plan adopted as the basis of this organization was a purchase of lands in bulk, the purchase money to be subscribed in shares, subscriptions payable in "final certificates," as the original petition had contemplated. The call found favor, and the delegates met March 8, 1786, at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern as proposed. General Rufus Putnam was elected chairman of the meeting. A committee, composed of himself, General Samuel H. Parsons and Rev. Manasseh Cutler, was appointed to receive such subscriptions, payable in public securities, and which securities, when received, should be applied to the purchase from Congress of a quantity of land west of the Ohio, upon which the subscribers were to settle. One year was allowed for procuring subscriptions, and on March 8, 1787, the association reconvened, this time at Brackett's Tavern,* Boston. The subscriptions

Nothing would have tempted that staunch old Puritan to frequent an inn of ill or indefinite repute. The fact that in 1728 the Bunch of Grapes was chosen as the lodging place of Governor William Burnet shows that it had already attained the first rank among the hostelries of the town." In 1735 the first Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons in America was organized here. The earliest benevolent association in Boston, and one of the oldest in America, the Scots' Charitable Society, held its meetings during 1767 and 1768 at the Bunch of Grapes. A tradition is also current that the first meeting for the organization of Trinity Church, Boston, was held at the Bunch of Grapes. The Boston Massacre took place almost before its very door, and after the evacuation of Boston by the British, Washington was a guest at this tavern. The Sons of Freedom gave an entertainment in honor of General Stark in 1777, and, at a late period, Lafayette was a visitor at the Bunch of Grapes. The first meeting for the organization of the Ohio Company was held at this hostelry, and, "on the whole, it may perhaps be considered the most memorable event connected with its history."—Atlantic Monthly for December, 1889.

were considered enough to warrant the undertaking. The company was then formally organized as the Ohio Company of Associates.*

General Rufus Putnam, General Samuel H. Parsons and Rev. Manasseh Cutler were elected directors. Gen. James M. Varnum was subsequently added to their number. Major Winthrop Sargeant was appointed secretary. General Parsons was empowered to proceed at once to New York and there negotiate with Congress for the purchase of the lands.

General Parsons differed seriously, and perhaps wisely, from the majority of the associates as to what lands it was best to purchase, if they could purchase at all. He preferred the Valley of the Scioto, for its rich and level bottoms. They preferred the Valley of the Muskingum, for its several navigable streams and for the long front on the Ohio which the bend in that river gave. The difference between the associates and General Parsons led to the transfer of his mission, quite early in the summer, to the Rev. Dr. Cutler. This gentleman had been an army chaplain in the Revolutionary War, and at the time of his appointment to succeed General Parsons was a Congregational clergyman preaching at Ipswich, Mass. He drove in a sulky from Ipswich to New York, arriving at the latter place July 5, 1787, and in his diary says:

"About three o'clock I arrived at the city by the road that enters the Bowery. Put up my horse at the sign of the Plow and Harrow, in the Bowery."

The day after his arrival he writes:

"At eleven o'clock I was introduced to a number of members on the floor of Congress chamber in the City Hall by Colonel Carrington, member for Virginia."

This City Hall stood on the corner of Wall and Nassau streets, the site of the present sub-treasury of the United States. The city authorities had tendered it to the Congress convened under the Articles of Confederation, by whom it was occupied, until they in turn were succeeded by the Congress assembled under the present constitution. A statue of Washington now designates the spot where he was first inaugurated, on the balcony of the hall, April 30, 1789. To me the site of this hall has another and a peculiar interest from the fact that it was here also that the Ordinance of 1787 was enacted.

Let me now take up again the connection between the Petition and the Ordinance. We have seen that, at the first inception of the project, and in advance of the petition, Washington wrote to Theodoric Bland, who introduced in Congress an ordinance apparently designed to carry out the views of

* "Among the many distinguished men who were members of the Ohio Company, but who never became actual settlers, were Hamilton and Dexter, the first and third secretaries of the treasury; Henry Knox, the first secretary of war; three governors of Massachusetts, of whom one was also a vice-president of the United States; a governor of Rhode Island and a governor of Connecticut; a United States senator from Connecticut, a postmaster-general under the Continental Congress, an associate justice of the United States supreme court, and a president of Harvard College."—*From a paper read before the Ohio Society of New York by John Q. More than a hundred officers of the Revolutionary army were also members of the company.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

the petitioners, but that facts then existing made the project at the time impracticable. In September, 1783, General Knox wrote to General Washington:

“I am daily solicited for information respecting the progress of the officers’ petition for a new state westward of the Ohio. . . .

“Were the prayer of the petition to be granted, the officers in a few years would make the finest settlement on the frontier, and form a strong barrier against the barbarian. . . .

“Congress have evinced so much wisdom and magnanimity in their conduct that it cannot be doubted that they will make the most substantial arrangements for future exigencies consistent with their revenue and their nicest economies.”

During the same month, as I have said, Washington wrote to James Duane, a member of Congress from New York, proposing “the first definite plan for the formation of new states in the West,” and also outlining a broad scheme of policy for dealing with the Indian question, thus dealing at once with the two points most essential to the wish of the petitioners. In the same month Congress accepted the cession from Virginia, with a single condition precedent, which was eventually approved of by that state.

April 5, 1784, General Rufus Putnam wrote to Washington again:

“You are sensible of the necessity, as well as the possibility, of both officers and soldiers fixing themselves in business somewhere as soon as possible, as many of them are unable to lie longer on their oars, waiting the decision of Congress on our petition, and, therefore, must unavoidably settle themselves in some other quarter which, when done, the idea of removing to the Ohio country will probably be at an end with respect to most of them. Besides, the commonwealth of Massachusetts have come to a resolution to sell their eastern country for public securities, and should their plan be formed and propositions be made public before we hear anything from Congress respecting our petition and the terms on which the lands petitioned for are to be obtained; it will undoubtedly be much against us by greatly lessening the number of Ohio associates.”

In reply to this Washington wrote, June 2, 1784:

“I could not answer your favor of the 5th of April from Philadelphia, because General Knox, having mislaid, only presented the letter to me in the moment of my departure from that place. The sentiments of esteem and friendship which breathe in it are exceedingly pleasing and flattering to me, and you may rest assured they are reciprocal.

“I wish it was in my power to give you a more favorable account of the officers’ petition for lands on the Ohio and its waters than I am about to do. As to this matter and information respecting the establishment for peace were my inquiries as I went through Annapolis solely directed, but could not learn that anything decisive had been done in either. . . . Surely, if justice and gratitude to the army and general policy to the Union were to govern in this case, there would not be the smallest interruption in granting its request. . . . At Princeton, before Congress left that place, I exerted every power I was master of, and dwelt upon the argument you have used, to show the propriety of a speedy decision. Every member with whom I conversed acquiesced in the reasonableness of the petition. All yielded or seemed to yield to the policy of it, but plead the want of cession of the land to act upon; this is made and accepted, and yet matters, as far as they have come to my knowledge, remain in statu quo."

It did befall, however, that just two weeks later, Mr. Jefferson, of Virginia; Mr. Chase, of Maryland, and Mr. Howell, of Virginia, "a committee appointed to prepare a plan for the temporary government of the Western territory," reported a substitute for the Bland ordinance of the preceding year, and which, largely amended, presently became a law. Its controlling feature was the following provision:

"Provided, that both the temporary and permanent governments be established on these principles as their basis:

"1. That they shall forever remain a part of the United States of America.

"2. That, in their persons, property and territory, they shall be subject to the Government of the United States in Congress assembled, and to the Articles of Confederation, in all those cases in which the original states shall be so subject.

"3. That they shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts, contracted or to be contracted, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other states.

"4. That their respective governments shall be in republican forms, and shall admit no person to be a citizen who holds any hereditary title.

"5. THAT, AFTER THE YEAR 1800 OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA, THERE SHALL BE NEITHER SLAVERY NOR INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE IN ANY OF THE SAID STATES, OTHERWISE THAN IN THE PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES WHEREOF THE PARTY SHALL HAVE BEEN DULY CONVICTED TO HAVE BEEN PERSONALLY GUILTY."

This is the first appearance of these immortal words which have now such transcendent associations.*

The designation "involuntary servitude" is not, as here used, a mere

* Jefferson was undoubtedly their author. The original draft of this ordinance, on file in the department of state, is entirely in Jefferson's handwriting. His views in regard to slavery are forcibly expressed in his Notes on Virginia. He says: "Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are the gift of God; that they are not to be violated but with His wrath. Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that His justice cannot sleep forever; that considering numbers, nature and natural means only, a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situation is among possible events, that it may become probable by supernatural influence! The Almighty has no attribute which can take sides with us in such a contest." He hoped that a way "was preparing, under the auspices of Heaven, for a total emancipation."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

synonym of "slavery." It was meant to preclude the enforcement of contracts to serve for a term of years, or for life, and was of large practical value in that sense.*

That intending settlers might rely upon these provisions as irrevocable, this forerunner of the ordinance went on to provide:

"That all the preceding articles shall be formed into a charter of compact; shall be duly executed by the President of the United States in Congress assembled, under his hand and the seal of the United States; shall be promulgated and shall stand as fundamental conditions between the thirteen original states and these newly described, unalterable but by joint consent of the United States, in Congress assembled, and of the particular state within which such alteration is proposed to be made."

This feature is fully preserved in the subsequent Ordinance of 1787.

This toleration of slavery until 1800 the committee reported in deference to the situation of the old French families, and perhaps some others, who already had slaves within the territory, and were protected there in holding them by treaty stipulations.†

* An Act of the territory of Indiana, passed September 17, 1807, and continued in Illinois after that territory was made separate from Indiana, provided as follows:

Sec. 1. "It shall and may be lawful for any person, being the owner or possessor of any negroes or mulattoes of and above the age of fifteen years, and owing labor and service as slaves in any of the states or territories of the United States, or for any citizen of the said states or territories purchasing the same, to bring the said negroes and mulattoes into this territory." Sec. 2. "The owner or possessor of any negroes or mulattoes, as aforesaid, and bringing the same into this territory, shall, within thirty days after such removal, go with the same before the clerk of the court of common pleas of the proper county, and in the presence of said clerk, the said owner or possessor shall determine and agree, to and with his or her negro or mulatto, upon the term of years which the said negro or mulatto will and shall serve his or her said owner or possessor, and the said clerk is hereby authorized and required to make a record thereof, in a book which he shall keep for that purpose." Sec. 3. "If any negro or mulatto, removed into this territory, as aforesaid, shall refuse to serve his or her owner, as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such person, within sixty days thereafter, to remove the said negro or mulatto to any place which by the laws of the United States or territory, from whence such owner or possessor may, or shall be authorized to remove the same" (sic).

Repeated litigations were had under this act, and it was uniformly held invalid, because in conflict with the prohibition of the ordinance. Something of the same kind was attempted in some of the Southern states immediately after the war.

Probably the idea was suggested to Mr. Jefferson by the custom at that time prevalent in this country with shipmasters and merchants, of bringing over white immigrants under contracts to serve for a term of years, in lieu of the payment of passage money. This, in its turn, is now to some extent reproduced among us by Italian padrones and others.

"Conditional servitude under indentures or covenants had from the first existed in Virginia. Once, at least, James sent over convicts, and once, at least, the city of London a hundred homeless children from its streets. The servant stood to his master in the relation of a debtor bound to discharge by his labor the costs of emigration. White servants came to be a usual article of merchandise. They were sold in England to be transported, and in Virginia were to be purchased on shipboard."—Bancroft's History of the United States, Vol. I., p. 125.

† At Vincennes, on the Ohio, at this time, and at Cahokia, on the Mississippi, nearly opposite St. Louis; at Kaskasia, thirty miles southeast of St. Louis, and at Detroit there were small French settlements. These, with a few families who claimed Virginia citizenship, made up in all about three thousand people other than the Indians in the whole of that vast area. Even these were not citizens of the United States; and the majority of them gradually removed across the Mississippi to "Louisiana," or to Canada, taking their slaves with them.

Even this prospective exclusion was struck out in committee of the whole, on motion of Mr. Spaight, of South Carolina. Thus modified, the ordinance passed Congress and became a law April 23, 1784.

The men who had fought so many years for a free country, and who proposed to make the total exclusion of slavery an essential and irrevocable feature of the constitution of the state they were to found, had no use for a grant of governmental powers from which the power to exclude slavery was entirely withdrawn. The ordinance of April 23, 1784, fell flat, and no attempt of any kind was ever made to set up under it an actual government. It was a dead letter on the statute book until it was replaced by the renowned Ordinance of 1787, in which the total exclusion of slavery was made an essential and irrevocable feature.

Years afterwards, the Ohio Company's famous agent, Rev. Manasseh Cutler,* in explaining to his son, Judge Ephraim Cutler, how it came that

* Rev. Manasseh Cutler, LL.D., was a remarkable man. He was a clergyman, but he was a great deal more: a lawyer, a physician, an educator, a politician, a man of affairs, a farmer and a scientist; and in all of these callings he did good work. He was born in Killingly, Conn., on May 30, 1742; graduated from Yale College in 1765, and admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1767. Being attracted to the work of the Christian ministry, he studied theology, and in 1771 was ordained as pastor of a Congregational society in Ipswich Hamlet, since 1793 known as the town of Hamilton, Mass. He remained with this society until his death, a period of more than half a century. When the Revolutionary War began he stirred his townsmen with rousing words, and soon thereafter was appointed chaplain in the army. Towards the close of the war he studied medicine, that he might minister alike to the bodily and the spiritual needs of his flock. The cause of his interest in the Ohio Company is explained by the following memorandum, preserved in his handwriting:

"At this meeting by ye desire of Major Sargent, I attended. I had suffered exceedingly in ye war, and after it was over, by paper money and ye high price of articles of living, my salary small and family large, for several years I thought ye people had not done me justice, and I meditated leaving them. Purchasing lands in a new country appeared to be ye only thing I could do to secure a living to myself and family in that unsettled state of public affairs. I had long before entertained a high opinion of ye lands in ye western country, which was a particular inducement to attend this meeting. The representations and plans of ye country gave a still more favorable idea, and I determined to join ye association, but without ye most distant thought of taking an active part."

McMaster, in his history of the people of the United States, writes of Cutler at this period: "He had been bred first to the bar and then to the ministry, but his true calling was politics. He was clear of head, sound of judgment, of great push and energy, and in the pursuit of his aims not over careful of the means used. He was chosen, therefore, to go before Congress and purchase the land, and the choice could not have fallen on a better man."

The words of Senator Hoar, spoken at the Marietta Centennial, are even more "fitly chosen." "Manasseh Cutler was probably the fittest man on the continent, except Franklin, for a mission of delicate diplomacy. Putnam was a man after Washington's pattern and after Washington's own heart. Cutler was a man after Franklin's pattern and after Franklin's own heart. He was the most learned naturalist in America, as Franklin was the greatest master in physical science. He was a man of consummate prudence in speech and conduct; of courtly manners; a favorite in the drawing-room and in the camp, with a wide circle of friends and correspondents among the most famous men of his time. During his brief service in Congress he made a speech on the judicial system, in 1803, which shows his profound mastery of constitutional principles. It fell to his lot in 1787 to conduct a negotiation second only in importance in the history of his country to that which Franklin conducted with France in 1778. Never was ambassador crowned with success more rapid or more complete."

In 1788 Cutler made a journey to the West. He was nearly a month on his way from his home in Massachusetts, traveling in a sulky to the new settlement on the Ohio. He had

“the prohibition of slavery and the recognition of religion, morality and knowledge as foundations of civil government were incorporated into the ordinance, said, ‘I was acting for associates, friends and neighbors, who would not embark in the enterprise unless these principles were unalterably fixed.’”

In June, 1785, while Congress was still deliberating, we find Pickering writing about the “plan” to Rufus King, afterwards a distinguished citizen of New York, United States senator and minister to England, but who was at that time a member of Congress from Massachusetts. It will be remembered that the draft which Mr. Jefferson reported proposed the exclusion of slavery only from and after the year 1800, while the total exclusion of slavery was the purpose of the petitioners of 1783. Hence, early in 1785, Pickering writes to King a long letter, from which the following is condensed:

“I should have objected to the period (A. D. 1800) proposed for the exclusion of slavery, for the admission of it for a single day or an hour ought to have been forbidden. It is infinitely easier to prevent the evil at first than to eradicate or check it at any future time. For God’s sake, let one more effort be made to prevent so terrible a calamity.”

To this Mr. King replied as follows:

“NEW YORK, 15th April, 1785.

“The best return in my power to make you for your ingenious communication on the mode of disposing of the Western Territory, is to enclose for your examination the form of an ordinance reported to Congress on the subject. You will find thereby that your ideas have had weight with the committee who reported this ordinance, and I have only to add that I shall hold myself particularly obliged by your further communications on the subject.

“I likewise enclose you the report of a committee on a motion for the exclusion of slavery from the new states. Your ideas on this unjustifiable practice are so just that it would be impossible to differ from them.”

Mr. King here refers to the fact that at his instance the Congress had, in committee of the whole, adopted the following as a clause to be reported for enactment as an amendment to the ordinance as at that time in force:

“That there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of considered the matter of a permanent residence at Marietta and decided against it; but his interest in the new country was very great. It was interesting to him as a naturalist, as a patriot and as a religious man. The national grants of land for educational and religious purposes were obtained through his foresight and earnest solicitation. With him also the establishment of a university was “a first object,” and “lay with great weight on his mind.”

From 1801 until 1805 he was a member of Congress, declining reelection.

He was a member of many scientific bodies, and was also a correspondent of learned men in all parts of the world. An early taste for astronomy, and especially for botany, remained with him as long as he lived. The honorary degree of doctor of laws was conferred upon him, in 1791, by Yale College.

“Patriotism glowed in his heart; whether at home or abroad his mind was intent on projecting great and good plans, consulting the benefit of generations to come.”

He died at his home in Hamilton, Mass., on the 28th of July, 1823.

the states described in the resolve of Congress of the 23d of April, 1784, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been personally guilty; and that this regulation shall be an article of compact and remain a fundamental principle of the constitution between the thirteen original states, and each of the states described in the said resolve of the 23d of April, 1784."

This was, however, never taken up for final action, and never became a law. About this time Pickering bought land in Pennsylvania and settled there. He does not figure afterwards as one of the associates.

A principal cause of this dilatory course was the fact that the deeds of cession, by Virginia and Massachusetts, stipulated that the new states in the Northwest Territory should not exceed in area one hundred and fifty miles square, and the terms of this requirement had by resolution of Congress been accepted.

In Congress and out of it there existed a strenuous feeling that this limitation was unwise and would prove most unfortunate. The most active exponent of this feeling was James Monroe, who had been at the pains to personally visit the Northwest Territory, after which, January 19, 1786, he wrote to Thomas Jefferson the following complimentary description of the present states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois:

"A great part of the territory is miserably poor, especially that near Lakes Michigan and Erie; and that upon the Mississippi and Illinois consists of extensive plains which have not had, from appearances, and will not have a single bush on them for ages. The districts, therefore, within which these fall will, perhaps, never contain a sufficient number of inhabitants to entitle them to membership in the Confederacy, and in the meantime the people in them will be governed by the resolutions of Congress, in which they will not be represented."

This feeling led Monroe to take such action in Congress that, on his motion, that body, March 24, 1786, resolved:

"That it be and hereby is recommended to the legislature of Virginia to take into consideration their act of cession and revise the same so far as to empower the United States in Congress assembled to make such a division of the territory of the United States lying northerly and westerly of the River Ohio into distinct republican states, not more than five nor less than three, as the situation of that country and future circumstances may require."

It is not to be overlooked, however, that other causes were in force, contributing at least to defer an active movement to restore the anti-slavery cause. The petition itself asks only that "whenever the Honorable Congress shall be pleased to procure the aforesaid lands of the natives, they will make provision for the location and survey of the lands;" and that then the grants requested may be made.

No further attempt was made to amend the ordinance of 1784 until April 26, 1787, when a committee composed of Mr. Johnson, of Connecticut; Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina; Mr. Smith, of New York; Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Henry, of Maryland, reported to Congress what was doubtless that ordinance in an amended form. It was essentially different from the ordinance of 1787, and it contained no provision whatever on the subject of slavery. On May 10, 1787, it was ordered to a third reading, and from that time remained unmolested until July 6, when, as we have seen, the agent of the Ohio Company of Associates appeared upon the floor. The "total exclusion of slavery" as "essential and irrevocable" was now, from whatever cause, at once to reappear. Nine days after Dr. Cutler's arrival Richard Henry Lee wrote to Washington, enclosing a copy of the ordinance of 1787, and saying: "I have the honor to enclose to you a copy of an ordinance that we have just passed in Congress for establishing a temporary government beyond the Ohio as a measure preparatory to a sale of lands."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The Ohio Company's application for a sale of land having been the immediate occasion for the passage of the ordinance, it is worth while to look into their share in securing the important result that it should embrace the anti-slavery proviso which it finally included, and which has proved its vital clause.

It must be borne in mind that at the time the ordinance was passed by the Congress sitting in New York, there was also in session, in Philadelphia, the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. The qualification of the anti-slavery clause in the ordinance, providing for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, is in harmony with the corresponding provision of the Constitution of the United States, and the two were contemporaneously adopted. Many members of Congress, indeed two of the five members of the committee to whom at an earlier date had been referred the original memorial of the Ohio Company presented by General Parsons, were also members of the Constitutional Convention. One of these was Rufus King, on whose motion the provision as to fugitive slaves was inserted in the constitution, and the same whom we recall as having at Pickering's instance reported to Congress in 1785 an anti-slavery amendment to the resolutions of 1784. Under these circumstances any evidence tending to show that the concurrent position of these two bodies and the incorporation with the ordinance of the anti-slavery proviso was the result of an agreement between persons who were members of both Congress and the convention is strongly corroborated by the circumstances of the case.

The other member of the committee of five, to whom was referred the original memorial of the Ohio Company, was James Madison, afterward President of the United States. His situation certainly enabled him to be well informed. His private secretary, while President, was Edward Coles, of Virginia, afterwards governor of Illinois, a man of great worth and force of character. In an address before the Pennsylvania Historical Society in 1857, on the history of the ordinance, Governor Coles says:

"This brings to my recollection what I was told by Mr. Madison, and which I do not remember ever to have seen in print. The old Congress held its sessions in 1787 in New York, while at the same time the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States held its sessions in Philadelphia. Many individuals were members of both bodies, and thus were enabled to know what was passing in each—both sitting with closed doors and in secret sessions. The distracting question of slavery was agitating and retarding the labors of both, and led to conferences and intercommunications of the members, which resulted in a compromise by which the northern or anti-slavery portion of the country agreed to incorporate into the ordinance and constitution the provisions to restore fugitive slaves; and this mutual and concurrent action was the cause of the similarity of the provision contained in both, and had its influence in creating the great unanimity by which the ordinance passed, and also in making the constitution the more acceptable to the slave holders.”

A compromise upon the basis that the ordinance should provide that fugitive slaves found within the territory should be returned carried with it, of course, a reciprocal agreement that slavery itself should be excluded by the ordinance.

In harmony at least with such an agreement, Congress, after the adoption of the Constitution, applied to the territory south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi a substantial re-enactment of the ordinance of 1787, but without the anti-slavery provision.

The anti-slavery proviso, however, was not in the ordinance (as reported by the committee). It was moved, as an amendment, by Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, and was unanimously carried. The ordinance was thereupon adopted, with one dissenting vote. Mr. Dane was the secretary of the committee. In a letter to Rufus King, written three days after the passage of the ordinance, he gives the following account of the passage of the amendment:

“We have been employed about several objects, the principal of which have been the government enclosed (the ordinance) and the Ohio purchase; former, you will see, is completed, and the latter will probably be completed to-morrow. We tried one day to patch up M——s system of W. government—started new ideas and committed the whole to Carrington, Dane, R. H. Lee, Smith and Kean. We met several times, and at last agreed on some principles—at least Lee, Smith and myself. We found ourselves rather pressed. The Ohio Company appeared to purchase a large tract of federal lands—about six or seven millions of acres—and we wanted to abolish the old system and get a better one for the government of the country, and we finally found it necessary to adopt the best system we could get. All agreed finally to the enclosed plan, except A. Yates. He appeared in this case, as in most others, not to understand the subject at all. * * * When I drew the ordinance (which passed, a few words excepted, as I originally formed it) I had no idea the states would agree to the sixth article, prohibiting slavery, as only Massachusetts, of the eastern states, was present, and therefore omitted it in the draft; but, finding the house favorably disposed on this subject, after we had completed the other parts, I moved the article, which was* agreed to without opposition."

Mr. Dane is here writing to his colleague from Massachusetts, who had been a member of the committee, about that feature of the committee's report which would naturally most interest Mr. King. He explains that they "had agreed on some principles," but that in drawing the report, he had at first omitted this feature, having no idea that Congress would accept it. Afterwards, finding himself mistaken as to the disposition of the house, he moved it as an amendment and it was unanimously adopted.

At the time of which he speaks, Lee and Carrington were both present in Congress. Lee certainly knew what had been agreed on in committee. Carrington certainly, and probably Lee, were warmly in favor of the exclusion of slavery, and both of them doubtless were familiar with the agreement which Madison afterwards related to Governor Coles. Their presence makes it not hard to account for Mr. Dane's being suddenly better informed, and for his motion to restore to the report what he had omitted from it.

While these suggestions tend to show that the controlling influence which determined the presence and complexion of the anti-slavery proviso moved upon a broader plane than the mere views or influence of the Ohio Company, it is well to remember that the company's application was nevertheless the immediate occasion of the passage of the Ordinance. Passed as a measure preparatory to a sale to them, their views and wishes naturally entered into the deliberations by which it was framed. When these are traced out, we are permitted to feel that the larger and controlling influence which I have mentioned allowed itself to be led by, and to give its sanction to the initiative of the company. Dr. Cutler, their agent, has left behind him a diary at once comprehensive and specific. On the 25th of June he was in Boston preparing to set out for New York. Among the events of that day, he chronicles: "Conversed with General Putnam. Received letters. Settled the principles on which I am to contract with Congress for lands for account of the Ohio Company." Dr. Cutler's reference long afterwards, in conversation with his son, to these same "principles," has been related already. Having arrived at New York, and as we have seen, been introduced to a number of members on the floor by Colonel Carrington of Virginia, he writes: "Delivered my petition for purchasing lands for the Ohio Company, and proposed terms and conditions of purchase. A committee was appointed to agree on terms of negotiation, and report to Congress." Doubtless what is here mainly referred to is conditions of price, payments, location, subdivisions and the like; but the record fully discloses that this committee was also formally charged with the reporting of an ordinance for

* The original of the committee's reports is preserved in the library of Congress. One leaf, printed on both sides, contains the whole. Slight alterations, in manuscript, have been identified as in Grayson's handwriting. The report as printed does not include the sixth article, prohibiting slavery and providing for the return of fugitive slaves. There is, however, on the second page, pasted to the edges of the leaf, a piece of foolscap paper on which the sixth article is written out in full, in the handwriting of Nathan Dane.

government as a preparatory measure, and that the "principles" were fully considered between the committee and the company's agent.

Grayson was at that time chairman pro tempore of Congress. The committee appointed by him consisted of Carrington, Dane, R. H. Lee, Kean of South Carolina, and Smith of New York. Of Grayson, and of this committee, Cutler writes: "Grayson, Carrington and Lee are certainly my warm advocates." Carrington was afterwards a shareholder in the Ohio Company. To this committee, July 9, was referred the ordinance which on May 10th had been ordered to a third reading, but had not since been taken up. Cutler now writes under date of July 10th:

"As Congress was now engaged in settling the form of government for the federal territory, for which a bill had been prepared and a copy sent to me, with leave to remark upon and to propose several amendments, I thought this the most favorable opportunity to go on to Philadelphia. Accordingly, after I had returned the bill with my observations, I set out at seven o'clock and crossed North River to Paulus Hook."

Not more is certainly known as to the scope of these amendments than has been already stated, except that Dr. Cutler left among his papers a copy of the ordinance, printed on a sheet on the margin of which is written, "that Mr. Dane requested Dr. Cutler to suggest such provisions as he deemed advisable, and that at Dr. Cutler's instance was inserted what relates to religion, education and slavery."*

Three days later the ordinance was enacted. Dr. Cutler did not see it until July 19th on his return from Philadelphia. He then writes:

"July 19th. Called on members of Congress very early this morning, and was furnished with the ordinance establishing a government in the western federal territory. It is, in a degree, new modeled. The amendments I proposed have all been made except one, and that is better qualified. It was that we should not be subject to continental taxation, unless we were entitled to a full representation in Congress. This could not be fully obtained; for it was considered in Congress as offering a premium to emigrants. They have granted us representation, with the right of debating, but not of voting, upon our being first subject to taxation."

* Temple Cutler, of Hamilton, Mass., writing September 29, 1849, to Judge Cutler, of Ohio (both sons of Dr. Cutler), and speaking of the interest in New England on the subject of the Ordinance of 1787, says: "Hon. Daniel Webster is now convinced that the man whose foresight suggested some of its articles was our father."

Judge Ephraim Cutler, on November 24, 1849, wrote as follows: "I visited my father at Washington during the last session he attended Congress. In his boarding-house he occupied a room with the reverend gentleman who represented Hampshire and the Connecticut counties, whose name I have forgotten. We were in conversation relative to the political concerns of Ohio, the ruling parties and the effects of the (Ohio) constitution in the promotion of the general interest; when he observed that he was informed that I had prepared that portion of the Ohio constitution which contained the part of the Ordinance of July, 1787, which prohibited slavery, he wished to know if it was a fact. On my assuring him it was, he observed that he thought it a singular coincidence, as he himself had prepared that part of the Ordinance while he was in New York negotiating the purchase of the lands for the Ohio Company."

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

It is not easy to reconcile this language, and the fact that he evidently found nothing in the ordinance by which he was surprised, with any other hypothesis than that the anti-slavery amendment was one of those which he had himself proposed.

Even the action of Congress, making the ordinance a law, declaring its provisions also to be articles of compact, was insufficient of itself. What it still needed was life, the power that grasps and that assimilates. That power came from the men who bore into the wilderness this ark of a new covenant, and set up there their temple of new institutions in which it was enshrined. From that spot, and by their aid, it grasped and held and fashioned all those germs of great new commonwealths, which afterwards grew up within the area of its jurisdiction and have given to it results of transcendent value.

I must here ask you to distinguish between two matters to which Dr. Cutler's efforts were directed. One was the settlement of terms and negotiation of a purchase of the lands which the Ohio Company desired to obtain. The other was the enactment by Congress of an ordinance which should provide a plan of government acceptable to the associates, and which should take the place of those provided by the ordinance or resolutions of 1784, the one which on that day had become a law, minus that anti-slavery feature which Mr. Jefferson had originally incorporated with it. The ordinance of 1787 was this substitute, and as we here see was adopted "as a measure preparatory to a sale of lands."

This preparatory measure, an indispensable prerequisite, being achieved, Dr. Cutler indefatigably pushed his negotiation with Congress for a purchase of public lands, and on July 23d a resolution passed approving a sale to the associates of a tract comprising about five millions of acres* in the southwest portion of the tract described in the petition of 1783, and being in extent about one-fourth of that tract. It was not, however, until July 27th that what he regarded as of vital importance in the terms of purchase was by a subsequent resolution adjusted to his liking. The precise boundaries were as follows:

Bounded by the Ohio from the mouth of the Scioto to the intersection of the western boundary of the seventh range of township, now surveying; thence by the said boundary to the northern boundary of the tenth township from the Ohio; thence by a due west line to the Scioto; thence by the Scioto to the beginning.

That is to say, beginning at Portsmouth on the Ohio, thence up that

* The Ohio Company's first application, presented by Dr. Cutler on July 6th, was for the purchase of one and a half million acres, and the purchase as first passed, July 19th, contemplated no more than that. But, on July 20th, Colonel Duer, secretary to the treasury board, made a secret proposition to Dr. Cutler to enlarge the contract and take in another company, offering him generous conditions to accomplish the business for them. This resulted in a contract for "nearly 5,000,000 acres of land, amounting to three millions and a half of dollars; one million and a half of acres for the Ohio Company, and the remainder for a private speculation in which many of the principal characters in America are concerned."—Cutler's Life, etc., I., 295, 305.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

stream to a short distance above Marietta; thence north about half-way to Lake Erie; thence west to a point somewhat northwest from Columbus; thence southeast to Portsmouth again.

Of the whole tract it was understood that the Ohio Company of Associates would purchase for itself one and a half million acres. The rest it was understood would be taken by "some of the principal characters of America who had become interested in the scheme." Without this concession to "some of the principal characters in America," says Dr. Cutler, Congress would not have approved the sale. The resolution of July 23d fixed the purchase price at "one dollar an acre, payable in specie, loan office certificates reduced to specie value, or certificates of liquidated debts of the United States" at par. These last were the "final certificates" paid to the officers at Newburgh in 1783. At the time the sale was authorized they were worth but a few shillings in the pound. Their actual value, with abatements and donations authorized by the resolutions, reduced the cost of the lands, in current funds, to about ten cents an acre. Hence, the interest in the scheme of "some of the principal characters in America." Suffice it to say that these last soon tired of their bargain and did not complete their purchase.*

After the passage of this second ordinance, the associates were allowed three months in which to prepare for the first payment on their lands, and on the 27th of October their contract was finally closed, covering one and a half million acres. They paid down in "final certificates" five hundred thousand dollars. For this they received immediate possession (with power to improve and cultivate) of seven hundred and fifty thousand acres. They were to pay as much more within one month of the completion of the survey, and thereupon to have a clear title to the whole. The price per acre was determined by the rate paid at the purchase of the land. Congress had authorized the board of treasury to sell at one dollar per acre subject to a reduction of one-third for bad lands. The board of treasury, upon this authority, sold to the Ohio Company a million and a half acres of land for one million dollars. It was also agreed that within the tract, and in addition

* What they did do has, I think, been fairly told in Howe's "Historical Collections of Ohio":

"A contract was made for a purchase of a part of the lands included in the Ohio Company's purchases. Plots and descriptions of the land contracted for were, however, made out, and Joel Barlow was sent as an agent to Europe to make sales for the benefit of the company, and sales were effected of parts thereof to companies and individuals in France. On February 19, 1791, two hundred and eighteen of these purchasers left Havre de Grace in France and arrived in Alexander, D. C., on the 3d of May following. During their passage two were added to their number. On their arrival they were told that the Scioto Company owned no land. The agent insisted that they did, and promised to secure to them good titles thereto. . . . When they arrived at Marietta about fifty of them landed. The rest of the company proceeded to Gallipolis, which was laid out about that time, and were assured by the agent that the place lay within their purchase. Every effort to secure titles to the lands they had purchased having failed, an application was made to Congress, and in June, 1798, a grant was made to them of a tract of land on the Ohio above the mouth of the Scioto river, which is called the 'French Grant.'"

Here is material for a romance.

to it, two entire townships of six miles square should be reserved for the establishment of a university; for common school purposes, section No. 16 (640 acres), in each township; "for the purposes of religion," section No. 29 in each township; and, to be subject to future disposition by the United States in each township, sections Nos. 8, 11 and 26. In negotiating their contract, the agents of the Ohio Company had expressly stipulated that the university lands should be included in the same conveyance with the very first tract which the company should pay for; "for to fix it in the centre of the proposed purchase might too long defer the establishment."

Their agent having thus completed the purchase, and secured for them the plan of government they wished, the "Ohio Company," as they had now come to be called, held further meetings at Brackett's Tavern, Boston, on the 21st and 23d of November, 1787. At the first was adopted a plan for starting a town at the mouth of the Muskingum, and for allotment of town lots and lands in severalty. At the second, the engineers and boat builders were directed to proceed to the headwaters of the Ohio, and there during the winter build boats in which the settlers in a body might in the spring descend the Ohio to the mouth of the Muskingum. The next meeting was held at Rice's Tavern, Providence, Rhode Island. At that meeting the Rev. Dr. Cutler, Colonel May and Maj. Haffield White were appointed a committee "to consider and report upon the expediency of employing some suitable person as a public teacher at the settlement now making by the Ohio Company." They reported in favor of the measure, and the Rev. Daniel Story was appointed. The engineers and boat builders, twenty-two men, started from Danvers, Mass., in December, 1787, under charge of Maj. Haffield White.* They arrived quite late in January, 1788, at Sumrell's Ferry, on the Youghiogheny, about thirty miles above Pittsburg.

* One detachment of the party came to Danvers from Ipswich in a body. Dr. Cutler himself supervised their departure, and one of his sons was among them, Jervis Cutler. Another son, Temple Cutler, has left a graphic account of the departure. Dr. Cutler's diary has this entry:

"Mon., Dec. 3. This morning a part of the men going to the Ohio met here two hours before day. I went on with them to Danvers. The whole joined at Major White's. Twenty men, employed by the company, and four or five on their own expense, marched at eleven o'clock. This party is commanded by Major White [Haffield White, a native of Danvers]. Captain Putnam took the immediate charge of the men, wagons, &c. Jervis went off in good spirits. He is well fitted for the journey."

The reminiscence of Temple Cutler, Dr. Cutler's youngest son, is as follows:

"The little band of pioneers assembled at the house of Dr. Cutler, in Ipswich, Mass., on the 3d day of December, 1787, and there took an early breakfast. About the dawn of day they paraded in front of the house, and, after a short address from him, full of good advice and hearty wishes for their happiness and prosperity, the men being armed, three volleys were fired, and the party (one of whom was his son Jervis, aged 19) went forward, cheered heartily by the bystanders. Dr. Cutler accompanied them to Danvers, where he placed them under command of Major Haffield White and Captain Ezra Putnam. He had prepared a large and well-built wagon for their use, which preceded them with their baggage. This wagon, as a protection from cold and storm, was covered with black canvas, and on the sides was an inscription in white letters, I think, in these words, 'For the Ohio at the Muskingum,' which Dr. Cutler painted with his own hand. Although I was then but six years old, I have a vivid recollection of all these circumstances, having seen the preparations and heard the conversations relative to this undertaking. I think the weather was pleasant and the sun

Meantime, in the same month, the rest of the party met at Hartford, and on January 1, 1788, began their march, in charge of Gen. Rufus Putnam, as director-general of the expedition. The second in command was Col. Ebenezer Sproat, who was also one of the signers of the petition of 1783. The snow in the Alleghanies was so deep that they built sleds for the transportation of their baggage. They had marched in winter time before—perhaps they had crossed the Delaware with Washington; and they pushed on. About the middle of February they joined the boat builders at Sumrell's Ferry.

Just at this time, February 7, 1788, Washington wrote to Lafayette that "the spirit of emigration to the western country is very predominant. Congress have sold in the year past a pretty large quantity of land on the Ohio for public securities, and thereby diminished the domestic debt considerably. Many of your military acquaintances, such as Generals Parsons, Varnum and Putnam; Colonels Tucker, Sproat and Sherman, with many more, propose to settle."

June 19, 1788, he wrote to Richard Henderson:

"No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at Muskingum. Information, property and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community."

Mr. Cutler says that when Lafayette, in 1825, arrived at Marietta, he inquired: "Who were the first adventurers to settle here?"

On being told he said: "I knew them well. I saw them fight the battles of their country at Long Island, Brandywine, Yorktown and many other places. They were the bravest of the brave. Better men never lived."

By the last of March the boats deemed necessary were completed. They were, a large boat forty-five feet long and twelve feet wide, a flat boat and three canoes. The large boat was roofed over and made bullet-proof, as a refuge from the Indians if need be. For some years afterwards it served a useful purpose for safe transportation to and from the mouth of the Muskingum. To this largest boat, the barge, was given the name "Union Galley." It seems a dull mind's eye that does not see that as the true freight of the original "Mayflower" was the "Compact" adopted in her cabin "for our better ordering and preservation to enact, constitute and frame such just and equal laws, from time to time," so, of this "Union Galley," prophetically named, as we shall hereafter see, the true burden which she bore was the Ordinance of 1787, with its "Articles of Compact," and chief among them that there should be "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except for crime." As to each of these incidents, the things that were not seen have proved to be the things that are eternal.

rose clear. I know I almost wished I could be of the party then starting, for I was told we were all to go as soon as preparation was made for our reception."—Life of Rev. Manasseh Cutler, Vol. I., pp. 329, 330.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The party left Sumrell's Ferry on April 1,* 1788, and went down the Ohio—some fifty men in all. Meeting with no interruption, they arrived on April 7th at the mouth of the Muskingum. They at once commenced building a block-house and laying out a town. They called the settlement Marietta, in honor of Marie Antoinette, and in memory of her sympathy extended to them in the Revolution. In July they were joined by the officers provided for by the Ordinance of 1787, who had been appointed by Congress in New York, October 5, 1787. They were the Governor, General St. Clair, who had been president of the Continental Congress; the secretary, Major Sargent; and Generals Parsons and Varnum, two of the three judges. The third judge, Maj. John Armstrong, had declined his appointment. On July 18th the government of the northwest territory was inaugurated by the proclamation of the Governor. It will be observed that all of these appointees were ex-officers of the Continental army.

It is interesting to look back at these four or five men assuming thus in the name of the United States, authority over a territory which extended from Pennsylvania and Virginia to the Mississippi River, and from the Ohio to the lakes. They were without troops, treasury or legislature; they could scarcely have maintained a single bailiff. The whole region was in control of great tribes of Indians who were unsubdued.

There could scarcely be said even to be then any United States. The present constitution had not been fully ratified by the states, and the articles of confederation which were in force were but a rope of sand. The federal government had not been able even to pay these very men their dues for services in war. Their faith was all that they and their associates had. It proved, as faith so often does, to be enough, when coupled with endeavor.

From this beginning of established government the progress of settlement was rapid. In August, 1788, the colony at Marietta was increased by the arrival of eight families. It now numbered one hundred and thirty-two men, besides some women and children. In October, John Cleves Symmes purchased from the United States a million acres fronting on the Ohio, between the Little and Great Miami Rivers. This gentleman had been chief justice of New Jersey, and was afterwards appointed by Congress one of the judges of the northwest territory vice John Armstrong, who declined. Three settlements were made upon this tract in the winter of 1788 and 1789, one of them being the first beginnings of the city of Cincinnati. The Ohio River was the highway of these travelers and their vehicles were flatboats. In the year 1796, one thousand of these "broad-horns," as they were called, passed down the river to what is now Ohio and Indiana.†

* April 2d is the date commonly given. General Putnam's diary is authority for April 1st.

† Flint, himself a pioneer, in his "Indian Wars of the West," thus speaks of early emigration:

"The writer of this distinctly remembers the wagon that carried out a number of adventurers from the counties of Essex and Middlesex in Massachusetts, on the second emigration to the woods of Ohio. He remembers the black canvas covering of the wagon; the

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The number of these settlers grew until, in 1803, despite a dreadful Indian war lasting from 1790 until 1795, the eastern division of the north-west territory was in readiness to be, and was, admitted as a state. There were not wanting those who made a struggle to remove, even at that date, the inhibition against slavery. Congress, however, had recognized that the provisions of the ordinance were a contract with the people who had settled there. Hence the enabling act required that the constitution of the state be not repugnant to those provisions. The struggle for a constitution free from this restriction, on the part of the Virginia and Kentucky immigrants, was, nevertheless, sharp enough to bring to its front some of the men of the Newburgh camp and their descendants. Foremost among them was Judge Ephraim Cutler, one of the first colonists, and son of that Manasseh Cutler by whose immediate agency, as it appears to me, the anti-slavery provision in the ordinance was inserted. The spirit of the ordinance and of its Revolutionary sponsors triumphed, and the proviso that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except in punishment of crime," became part of the first constitution of Ohio.*

white and large lettering in capitals, 'To Marietta on the Ohio!' He remembers the food which, even then, the thought of such a distant expedition furnished to his imagination. Some twenty emigrants accompanied the wagon."

The older states looked with ill-favor on this emigration. They were as yet but sparsely settled, and besides had lands within their own limits to sell. The criticism they experienced induced the emigrants to justify themselves by coloring their reports of their experience. A contest sprang up and families differed among themselves as to the wisdom of those members who joined the movement.

Judge Timothy Walker, in his address delivered at Cincinnati, in 1837, narrates his recollection of those times. He says:

"The powerful engine of caricature was set in motion. I have a distinct recollection of a picture I saw in boyhood, prefixed to an anti-moving to Ohio pamphlet, in which a stout, ruddy, well-dressed man on a sleek, fat horse, with a label, 'I am going to Ohio,' meets a pale and ghastly skeleton of a man, scarcely half-dressed, on the wreck of what was once a horse, already bespoken by the more politic crows, with a label, 'I have been to Ohio.'"

* "Judge Burnett's 'Notes' and William Henry Smith's 'Life of St. Clair' do not convey the impression that an issue was really drawn in the Ohio convention of 1802. But Judge Ephraim Cutler's journal conveys that impression very distinctly. Those favorable to slaves took the ground that, however it might be with the territory, the ordinance could not bind a state unless the state herself, as a party to a compact, assented to it; and they accordingly advocated a 'modified form' of servitude. Judge Cutler (a son of Dr. Manasseh Cutler) was one of the Washington county delegates to frame the constitution, and a member of the committee charged with framing the bill of rights, of which John W. Brown was chairman, Cutler's journal gives this account of proceedings in the committee: 'An exciting subject was, of course, immediately brought before the committee, the subject of admitting or excluding slaves, Mr. Brown produced a section which defined the subject, in effect, thus: No person shall be held in slavery, if a male, after he is thirty-five years of age; and if a female, after twenty-five years of age. I observed to the committee that those who had elected me to represent them were desirous of having this matter clearly understood, and I must move to have the section laid upon the table until our next meeting, and to avoid any warmth of feeling, I hoped that each member of the committee would prepare a section which should express his views fully on this important subject. The committee met the next morning, and I was called on for what I had proposed the last evening. I then read to them the section as it now stands in the constitution. Mr. Brown observed that what he had introduced was thought by the greatest men in the nation to be, if established in our constitution, obtaining a great step towards a general emancipation of slavery, and was, in his opinion, greatly to be preferred to what I had offered.'

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Jefferson was then president, and it may have given him pleasure to see this precept of his pen take on in this way a new permanence and power.

In the meantime, May 7, 1800, an Act of Congress had established a new territory, Indiana, comprising the whole northwest territory, outside of the limits of Ohio, then slightly larger than at present.

The enabling act provided for a government in all respects similar "to that provided by the ordinance of Congress passed on the 13th day of July, 1787."

Possibly this establishment of a new territory was brought about in part by efforts of the old slave-holding element, which was there already when the ordinance passed, particularly at Vincennes, where many slaves were held. Certain it is that that element immediately besought Congress to remove the anti-slavery provision, and five times in four years their petitions to that body were refused.

The most formidable of these originated with Gen. William Henry Harrison,* afterwards president of the United States. At that time, and

"The section that Cutler prepared prohibited slavery in the very words of the ordinance; it forbade the holding, as a servant, under pretense of indenture or otherwise, any male person twenty-one years of age, or female person eighteen years of age, unless such person had entered into the indenture while in a state of perfect freedom, and on condition of a bona fide consideration, received or to be received, for the service; closing with the clause: 'Nor shall any indenture of any negro or mulatto, hereafter made and executed out of this state, or if made in this state, where the term of service exceeds one year, be of the least validity, except those given in the case of apprenticeships.'

"After a sharp discussion in the committee the section was adopted by a majority of one, five votes to four; it now went to the convention, where several attempts were made to weaken or obscure the sense of the section on its passage. In committee of the whole a material change was introduced. Cutler was unwell and so absent at the time. 'I went to the convention,' he continues, 'and moved to strike out the obnoxious matter and made my objections as forcible as I was able, and when the vote was called Mr. Milligan changed his vote and we succeeded in placing it in its original state.' Thus by a majority of only one, first in the committee and afterwards in the convention itself, was the attempt to fasten a modified slavery upon the state of Ohio defeated."—Hinsdale's "The Old Northwest."

* William Henry Harrison was born within the present limits of Virginia, at Berkeley, Charles City county, February 9, 1773. He joined the army in 1792, and became captain in 1795. June 1, 1798, he resigned his commission in the army and was at once appointed by President John Adams secretary of the Northwest Territory, under Gen. Arthur S. Clair as governor. In October, 1799, Harrison resigned this position to take his seat, for a single year of service, as territorial delegate in Congress. During the session of Congress for this year part of the Northwest Territory was formed into the territory of Indiana, including the present states of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, and Harrison was made its governor and superintendent of Indian affairs. To this post he was reappointed successively by both Jefferson and Madison. In 1805 he organized at Vincennes the legislature of the territory. He was the son-in-law of John Cleves Symmes, the founder of Cincinnati and the settlements in that vicinity. It was in connection with his ever memorable campaign for the presidency, in 1840, that the name Buckeye came into general use, as applied to the state of Ohio and to its most distinguished citizen. The first application of this word to anything except the buckeye tree was made by the Indians, who were greatly impressed by the bearing of Col. Ebenezer Sproat, who acted as high sheriff at the opening of the first court held in the Northwest Territory in 1788 at Marietta, O. He marched at the head of the procession with drawn sword. So imposing was he in stature, and so striking his dignity, that the Indians cried out "Hetuck," or "Big Buckeye." In 1840 a Democratic newspaper declared that General Harrison was "better fitted to sit in a log-cabin and drink hard cider than to rule in the White House." This expression was generally resented, and so began the log-cabin and hard-cider campaign. Log-cabins sprang up all over the state and country, and for some years afterwards, he was governor of the territory, and the petition bore the endorsement not only of himself as governor, but also of the legislative council. It was prepared and forwarded in the winter of 1802-3, and set forth urgently the advantages which would accrue to the territory from immigration from the older states if the intending settlers were not deterred by the necessity of first disposing of their slaves. The petition was referred to a committee, at the head of which was John Randolph of Virginia. He reported from this committee, March 2, 1803, the following resolution:

“Resolved, That it is inexpedient to suspend for a limited time the operation of the Sixth Article of Compact between the original states and the people and states west of the Ohio.”

The report reads further:

“That the rapid population of the state of Ohio sufficiently evinced in the opinion of your committee, that the labor of slaves is not necessary to promote the growth and settlement of colonies in that region. That this labor, demonstrably the dearest of any, can only be employed to advantage in the cultivation of products more valuable than any known to that quarter of the United States. That the committee deem it highly dangerous and inexpedient to impair a provision wisely calculated to promote the happiness and prosperity of the northwestern country, and to give strength and security to that extensive frontier. In the salutary operation of this sagacious and benevolent restraint it is believed that the inhabitants of Indiana will, at no distant day, find ample remuneration for a temporary privation of labor and of emigration.”

The illustration was significant and the prediction just. Thirty years later Chief Justice Chase, in his preface to the Revised Statutes of Ohio, thus eloquently referred to the scope of the ordinance of 1787 and to its actual operation:

“By the ordinance of 1785, Congress had executed in part the great national trust confided to it, by providing for the disposal of the public lands for the common good, and by prescribing the manner and terms of sale. And by that of 1787 provision was made for successful forms of territorial were even carried in political processions. The first of these, which became a model for many others, was built of buckeye logs. It was filled, roof and all, with enthusiastic Buckeye boys, who sang lustily:

“O what, tell me what, is to be your cabin's fate?
We'll wheel it to the Capitol, and place it there elate
For a token and a sign of the Bonnie Buckeye state.”

The campaign was intensely exciting, and the buckeye figured in it largely. Myriads of men shouted for General Harrison:

“Hurrah for the father of the Great West,
For the Buckeye who follows the plow.”

General Harrison was indeed a “Big Buckeye.” His “Big Buckeye” grandson now worthily fills the presidential chair, which he himself filled for a period all too brief.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

government, adapted to successive steps of advancement in the settlement of the western country. It comprehended an intelligible system of law on the descent and conveyance of real property and the transfer of personal goods. It also contained five articles of compact between the original states and the people and states of the territory, establishing certain great fundamental principles of governmental duty and private right as the basis of all future constitutions and legislation, unalterable and indestructible except by that final and common ruin which, as it has overtaken all former systems of human polity, may yet overwhelm our American union.

“Never, probably, in the history of the world did a measure of legislation so accurately fulfill and yet so mightily exceed the anticipations of the legislators. The ordinance has been well described as having been a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night in the settlement and government of the northwestern states. When the settlers went into the wilderness they found the law already there. It was impressed upon the soil itself, while it yet bore up nothing but the forest. The purchaser of land became by that act a party to the compact and bound by its perpetual covenants, so far as its conditions did not conflict with the terms of the cessions of the states.

* * * * *

“This remarkable instrument was the last gift of the Congress of the old confederation to the country, and it was a fit consummation of their glorious labors. At the time of its promulgation the federal constitution was under discussion in the convention, and in a few months, upon the organization of the new national government, that Congress was dissolved, never again to reassemble. Some, and indeed most, of the principles established by the articles of compact are to be found in the plan of 1784 and in the various English and American bills of rights. Others, however, and these not the least important, are original. Of this number are the clauses in relation to contracts, to slavery, and to the Indians. On the whole, these articles contain what they profess to contain, the true theory of American liberty. The great principles promulgated by it are wholly, purely American. They are, indeed, the genuine principles of freedom unadulterated by that compromise with circumstances, the effects of which are visible in the constitution and history of the union.”

Five years after this, in an address delivered on the semi-centennial of the ordinance, Judge Timothy Walker eulogizes the wonderful fact that in spite of the great interests and wide areas which for half a century it had controlled, not one of them all had ever made necessary an amendment of the ordinance. Judge Walker, speaking at Cincinnati in 1837, said:

“Upon the surpassing excellence of this ordinance no language of panegyric would be extravagant. It approaches as nearly to absolute perfection as anything to be found in the legislation of mankind; for after the experience of fifty years it would, perhaps, be impossible to alter without marring it. In short, it is one of those matchless specimens of sagacious forecast which even the reckless spirit of innovation would not venture to assail. The emigrant knew beforehand that this was a land of the highest political as well as national promise, and under the auspices of another Moses he journeyed with confidence towards his new Canaan."

Earlier than either of these, in the speech to which Hayne replied and which was followed by the wonderful "Reply to Hayne," Webster had said:

"We are accustomed to praise the lawyers of antiquity; we help to perpetuate the fame of Solon and Lycurgus; but I doubt whether one single law of any lawgiver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked and lasting character than the Ordinance of 1787. We see its consequences at this moment, and we shall never cease to see them, perhaps, while the Ohio shall flow."

Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, brought his admirable and eloquent oration at the Marietta centennial to this conclusion:

"We stand by the graves of great soldiers of the War of Independence. This is the centennial of the state within whose borders were born Grant, and Sherman, and Sheridan, and Garfield. The men of the Revolution fought that the principles of the Ordinance of 1787 might become living realities. The great captains of the late war fought that the compact might be kept and forever remain unalterable. The five states of the northwest sent nearly a million soldiers into the war for the Union. * * * It is this that makes the birthday of Ohio another birthday of the nation itself. Forever honored be Marietta as another Plymouth. The Ordinance belongs with the Declaration of Independence and the constitution. It is one of the three title-deeds of American constitutional liberty. As the American youth for uncounted centuries shall visit the capital of his country, * * * he will admire the evidences of its grandeur and the monuments of its historic glory, * * * but if he know his country's history and consider wisely the sources of her glory, nothing will so stir his heart as two fading and time-soiled papers, whose characters were traced by the hands of the fathers a hundred years ago. They are original records of the acts which devoted this nation forever to equality, to education, to religion, and to liberty. One is the Declaration of Independence, the other the Ordinance of 1787."

The last report of one of these Indiana petitions for removal of the anti-slavery prohibition of the ordinance was made to the senate in November, 1807, by Mr. Franklin, of North Carolina, upon a petition from the legislative council and house of representatives. The report was adverse and was concurred in by the senate without a dissenting vote.

This virtually ended the conflict. The eastern portion of the Indiana territory filled up rapidly with settlers from Ohio and the north, and when, in 1816, that eastern portion came to be the state, its constitution bore the seal of the great ordinance that there should be "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime."

In Illinois there was the same struggle, with more peril as to the result. The pro-slavery element in that portion of the northwest territory was even stronger and more violent than it had been in Indiana. In spite of the provision of the enabling act that the new constitution should conform to the requirements of the Ordinance of 1787, this element made strenuous efforts, in the campaign for the election of delegates to the convention, and afterwards in that body, to secure a constitution that did not inhibit slavery. It failed; and in 1818, once more came into being a new state, having the old certificate of lineage, in a constitution which provided that within its boundaries there should be "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime."

Once in the Union as a state, the state of Illinois was free to amend its constitution with regard to slavery as was any other state. The slave power was not slow to take advantage of this liberty, and in 1824 a tremendous effort was made to secure a new constitutional convention with that end in view. The rival candidates for governor were nominated on that issue. The struggle was intense, but the call for a convention was defeated. This result was large due to Edward Coles, whom I have already mentioned. He was the anti-slavery candidate for governor, and was elected.

Thirty years afterwards—in 1856—in his "History of the Ordinance of 1787," he refers to his own part in that struggle as his consolation in old age, at the same time that with prophetic foreboding, referring to the ordinance, he says: "Since its principles were repudiated in 1854 we have had nothing but contention, riots and threats, if not the awful realities of civil war."*

The subject matter of those apprehensions, which he thus expressed, is part of that later history of the ordinance which most concerns ourselves. In 1837 its illustrious phrase was stamped upon the constitution of Michigan, and in 1848 upon that of Wisconsin. The five states of the northwest territory were thus all made bright with freedom, like the five points of a star, and the whole area made radiant with the welfare of a free people.

Long before this the ordinance itself had entered on a new career.

From the first beginning of a feeling of opposition between the states upon the slavery question, that feeling took the form of jealousy over the relative number of the slave and free states which should be admitted into the Union and should thus give to one side or the other a preponderance in Congress.

The province of Congress to control the slavery question in the territories was determined by the fact that in law the slavery question is a question of property right. A person who is a slave is, in the contemplation of the law, the property of some one else. In the states, the care and province of the state include all rights of person and of property; the province of the federal government includes all interstate and international relations. In the territories, however, the province of the federal government includes, also,

* Vide p. 68. Coles died in 1868, having first lived through the storm of those realities to see the same repudiated principles, in their time-honored phrases, restored and made applicable to the whole United States. He was a Virginian, who had set his own slaves free, and had given to each head of a family 160 acres of land.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

the rights of person and of property, hence Congress controlled there the question of the right to property in slaves.

For a time this question was easily disposed of. South of the Ohio the settlers in territory not included in the states generally held slaves, while in the territory north of the Ohio there were none. By tacit agreement new states were admitted from alternate sides of the river. In this way came in Louisiana (1812), Indiana (1816), Mississippi (1817), Illinois (1818), Alabama (1819), and Maine (1820). The territory east of the Mississippi thus exhausted, Missouri the same year came knocking at the door. This raised a stormy question. What of the whole vast territory west of the Mississippi? That was settled by the famous "Missouri Compromise," an act of Congress approved March 6, 1820, entitled: "An Act * * * to Prohibit Slavery in Certain Territories," which in its eighth section applies the language of the ordinance of 1787 to the territory westward of the Mississippi:

"That in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36° 30' north latitude not included within the limits of the state contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be and is hereby forever prohibited: Provided always that any person escaping into the same from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any state or territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid."

This meant that it had been agreed upon in Congress that the line of the southern boundary of the northwest territory should be prolonged due west to the Pacific, and that new states, free and slave alternately from north and south of that line, should be admitted as before. Upon the passage of this act John Quincy Adams wrote to his wife:

"If the Union must be dissolved, the slavery question is precisely the question on which it ought to break. For the present, however, that question is laid to sleep."

It was supposed, and correctly, on both sides, that the territories, when they became states, would adopt or exclude slavery in accordance, in each instance, with their territorial condition. Hence it was that, on the adoption of this compromise, Mr. Adams regarded the question as "laid to sleep." If there was sleep, however, it was troubled sleep, not rest. Florida and Iowa and Arkansas and Oregon, it is true, came in respectively without contention. The acquisition of Texas and Mexico's territorial concessions tended to disturb the equilibrium by greatly enlarging the territory south of the dividing line. California was a cause of contest, involved with which were also the applications of New Mexico and Utah for territorial governments.

In 1854 these troubles culminated in the passage through Congress and approval by the president of the "Kansas-Nebraska bill," by which the Congress of the United States for the first time withdrew the protection of the ordinance from territory which the flag with its inscription had once covered. The repeal was in these words:

“The eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the states and territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void.”

I was a student in Yale College at the time. I remember that the church bells in New Haven were tolled as for a funeral when the act of repeal was passed. My father and mother were Virginians. They set their slaves free when they were married, and began life in a free state, but my early associations and my relatives were largely in the south. I was provoked by what seemed to me so much uncalled-for and jealous feeling. To-day those bells sound in my memory as the prophetic knell, I need not tell you of how many or of whom. Nor need I here trace out for you how the breaking out of the war arose from that appeal.

It is better to turn from these memories to the more pleasing contemplation of the majesty with which at the outbreak of the war, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kansas and Nebraska, as so many children of the ordinance, each bearing on its constitution the inscription that there should be “neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except for crime,” came to the rescue of the Union. More than a million soldiers enlisted on the side of freedom from these seven states. The influence of the ordinance in fixing the character of those states has been made plain to you. Perhaps their soldiers turned the scale; there were enough of them for that. In view of the repealing act of 1854, it was the very poetry of justice, when the victory came, to go back to the Ordinance of 1787; to take those words which, in the Kansas and Nebraska act, it was decreed, should be “inoperative and void,” and to declare of those words that throughout the United States, and in all places under their jurisdiction, they should be forever in full force.

The circumstances which attended this transaction deserve notice. On March 6, 1862, a special message of President Lincoln had urged upon Congress the adoption of a joint resolution pledging the co-operation of the United States, by both pecuniary aid and appropriate legislation, “with any state which may adopt the gradual abolishment of slavery”—the special idea in this being that the acceptance of it by the border states would cut off from the South all hope that these states would ever join in demanding the preservation of slavery. This suggestion the senate had adopted by a vote of thirty-two to ten. Other like proposals had been brought forward and considered in that body. There had been also some propositions in the house. No legislation, however, was perfected, and the full weight of the situation was left to be devolved upon the president, so far as concerned the question of slavery in the states. An act of Congress, approved June 19,

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

1862, enacted that from that date in any territory in the United States there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except for crime. A month later, July 19th, the president approved another act, which authorized the enlistment of colored men as soldiers, and provided that no fugitive slave should be surrendered by any person in the military or naval service; but that all slaves of rebels coming into the possession or under the protection of the government should be free. This march of events was quickened by the national success of September 17th, in the battle of Antietam, and on the 22d of that month President Lincoln issued his emancipation proclamation. The United States was now fully and finally committed to the principle embodied in the ordinance, and there remained only to fix that policy forever by embedding it in the organic law.

On December 14, 1863, in the second week of the first session of the thirty-eighth Congress, directly after the Speaker had announced the standing committees and during the call of states for bills on leave and joint resolutions, both Mr. Stevens and Mr. Ashley, having introduced bills for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, there followed the motion of which the following is the record:

"Mr. Ashley also introduced a bill to provide for the submission to the several states of a proposition to amend the national constitution prohibiting slavery, or involuntary servitude, in all of the states and territories now owned or which may be hereafter acquired by the United States."*

Mr. Ashley further introduced a joint resolution to authorize the enlistment of colored citizens in the rebellious districts; Mr. Lovejoy brought in a very radical bill for giving effect to the Declaration of Independence in the matter of the rights of colored persons; and Mr. Arnold proposed a measure in aid of the execution of President Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation. To these proposals Mr. Wilson added one for a joint resolution providing for the adoption by the states of an amendment to the constitution declaring that "Slavery, being incompatible with a free government, is forever prohibited in the United States; and involuntary servitude shall be permitted only as a punishment for crime."

Both Mr. Ashley's proposal and Mr. Wilson's were referred to the judiciary committee. No action was taken thereon before a joint resolution came from the senate, which became through the action of the house, the amendment for universal liberty everywhere in the United States.

The initiation in the senate of this grand completion of liberty in America was due to John B. Henderson, a senator of Missouri, who was at every stage of the great struggle conspicuous for the courage, sagacity and unwavering confidence with which he accepted, on behalf of the most important of the border states, whatever the new progress of the nation into light and liberty required. It was on the 11th of January, 1864, that Mr. Henderson introduced in the senate a joint resolution providing for an amendment, of which Article I was to be:

* Congressional Globe, 1st Sess. 38th Congress, page 19.

“Slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall not exist in the United States.”*

Mr. Sumner also introduced, February 8th, a resolution providing for a constitutional amendment declaring that, “Everywhere within the limits of the United States, and of each state or territory thereof, all persons are equal before the law, so that no person can hold another as a slave.”

On February 10, 1864, Mr. Trumbull, from the judiciary committee of the senate, to which these propositions had been referred, reported adversely upon Mr. Sumner’s, but returned Mr. Henderson’s altered to read in its chief section:

“Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.”

The identical paper upon which Mr. Henderson had written his resolution was returned by the judiciary committee to the senate, with the altered wording of the chief section. To this had been also added the second section as it now stands.†

The question of the resolution thus reported came up in the senate on the 28th of March, and on April 8th, after a vigorous debate, and fierce opposition, the resolution was adopted by a vote of 38 to 6.

Mr. Sumner objected in the debate to the retention of the language of the Ordinance of 1787, and in reply to him Mr. Howard, of Michigan, protested that he preferred —“to go back to the good old Anglo-Saxon language employed by our fathers in the Ordinance of 1787, an expression which has been adjudicated upon repeatedly, which is perfectly well understood both by the public and by judicial tribunals; a phrase, I may say further, which is peculiarly near and dear to the people of the northwestern territory, from whose soil slavery was excluded by it.”

The resolution thus adopted by the senate came up in the house on May 31, 1864, and excited there, along with zealous and powerful support, the most rancorous opposition, with the result, on coming to a vote, June 15, of 93 in its favor, to 65 against, and 23 not voting; a victory which fell short of the two-thirds requisite for initiating an amendment to the constitution. Mr. Ashley, not to lose what had been gained by the action of the

† As to this second section, Mr. Henderson writes me:

“Judge Trumbull, chairman of the judiciary committee, thought it advisable, before reporting the Thirteenth Amendment, to give express power to Congress to ‘carry out the amendment.’ This suggestion came out of the difficulties of construction as to the powers of Congress touching certain provisions of the constitution as originally framed. And after consultation with me, he added, before reporting back, the words giving Congress express power to enforce the amendment. We both agreed that these words did not add to nor detract from the meaning or force of the amendment as originally drawn, but thought it better to insert them in order to exclude all possibility of adverse argument as to the power of Congress to enforce by legislation the express words of the amendment.”

senate, and having changed his vote to the negative for the purpose, moved a reconsideration of the vote of the house, and, pending action upon this, the session came to an end.

The second session of the thirty-eighth Congress began December 5, 1864, and in his annual message President Lincoln, after stating that an "attempted march of three hundred miles directly through the insurgent region" was in course of execution by General Sherman, urged consideration and adoption of the Henderson joint resolution upon the grounds which he thus presented:

"Important movements have occurred during the year to the effect of moulding society for durability in the Union. Although short of complete success, it is much in the right direction that 12,000 citizens in each of the states of Arkansas and Louisiana have organized loyal state governments with free constitutions, and are earnestly struggling to maintain and administer them. The movements in the same direction—more extensive though less definite—in Missouri, Kentucky and Tennessee should not be overlooked. But Maryland presents the example of complete success. Maryland is secure to liberty and union for all the future. The genius of rebellion will no more claim Maryland. Like another foul spirit, being driven out, it may seek to tear her, but it will woo her no more.

"At the last session of Congress, a proposed amendment of the constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States passed the senate, but failed for lack of the requisite two-thirds vote in the house of representatives. Although the present is the same Congress and nearly the same members, and without questioning the wisdom or patriotism of those who stood in opposition, I venture to recommend the reconsideration and passage of the measure at the present session. Of course, the abstract question is not changed, but an intervening election shows almost certainly that the next Congress will pass the measure if this does not. Hence, there is only a question of time as to when the proposed amendment will go to the states for their action. And as it is to so go, at all events, may we not agree that the sooner the better? It is not claimed that the election has imposed a duty on members to change their views or their votes any further than, as an additional element to be considered, their judgment may be affected by it. It is the voice of the people now, for the first time, heard upon the question. In a great national crisis like ours, unanimity of action among those seeking a common end is very desirable—almost indispensable. And yet no approach to such unanimity is attainable unless some deference shall be paid to the will of the majority simply because it is the will of the majority. In this case the common end is the maintenance of the Union; and among the means to secure that end, such will, through the election, is most clearly declared in favor of such constitutional amendment."

On January 6, 1865, Mr. Ashley called up his motion to reconsider the vote upon the Henderson resolution. In the debate which followed not a few former opponents were supporters of the measure,* although the opposition was still determined and bitter, and on the 28th of January the motion for reconsideration was carried, and the final passage of the Henderson resolution accomplished, by a vote of 119 in its favor to 56 against, and 8 not voting.†

* The following nine representatives changed on this vote from opponents to supporters:
Augustus C. Baldwin, Michigan;
Alexander H. Coffroth, Pennsylvania;
Archibald McAllister, Pennsylvania;
James E. English, Connecticut;
Anson Herrick, New York.
William Radford, New York;
John B. Steele, New York;
Austin A. King, Missouri;
James G. Rollins, Missouri.

† Of this vote Governor Ashley has well said: "If the vote is analyzed, it will be seen that of the 119 votes recorded for the amendment thirteen (13) were by men from the border states, and eleven (11) were by Democrats from the free states. If but three (3) out of the twenty-four (24) who voted with us had voted against the amendment it would have failed. If but four (4) of the eight (8) members who were absent had appeared and voted against, it would have been lost. Had all the Northern Democrats who supported the amendment voted against, it would have been defeated by twenty-six (26) votes. Had all the border-state men who voted for it voted against, it would have failed by thirty-two (32) votes.

"If the border-state men and Northern Democrats who voted for the amendment had voted against, it would have failed by sixty-five (65) votes.

"Mr. Lincoln was especially delighted at the vote which the amendment received from the border slave states, and frequently congratulated me on that result.

"Bancroft, the historian, has drawn with a graphic pen the character of many of the able and illustrious men of the Revolution which achieved our independence. In writing of George Mason, of Virginia, he said: 'His sincerity made him wise and bold, modest and unchanging, with a scorn for anything mean and cowardly, as illustrated in his unselfish attachment to human freedom.' And these identical qualities of head and heart were pre-eminently conspicuous in all the border statesmen who voted for the Thirteenth Amendment.

"It would be difficult in any age or country to find grander or more unselfish and patriotic men than Henry Winter Davis and Governor Francis Thomas, of Maryland, or James S. Rollins, Frank P. Blair and Governor King, of Missouri, or George H. Yeaman, of Kentucky, or N. P. Smithers, of Delaware. And not less worthy of mention, for their unchanging fidelity to principle, are all the Northern Democrats who voted for the amendment, prominent among whom I may name Governor English, of Connecticut; Judge Homer A. Nelson and Moses S. Odell, of New York; Archibald McAllister, of Pennsylvania; Wells A. Hutchins, of Ohio, and A. C. Baldwin, of Michigan.

"Of the twenty-four (24) border-state and Northern men who made up this majority, which enabled us to win this victory, all had defied their party discipline, and had deliberately and with unflinching faith marched to their political death. These are the men whom our future historians will honor, and to whom this nation owes a debt of eternal gratitude."

One of these men, thus worthy of lasting honor, was the Hon. George H. Yeaman, of Kentucky. At the risk of transgressing somewhat the privacy of personal correspondence I venture to give the following extract from a descriptive letter which, some time ago, he wrote to me at my request:

"The amendment abolishing slavery in the United States had been introduced, and was approaching a vote in 1865. My first resolution was not to dodge, but to face the responsibility. There was still a strong Union element in my district, but I believed that the changes had been such that, on a full vote, the 'Southern Sympathizers' (which was then the name) would outnumber them, and I knew that those then ready for actual emancipation were only a small minority. My table was groaning under piles of letters from friends and Unionists—none from opponents—only two or three letters suggesting that as slavery was inevitably doomed, why not let it go now and be done with it. The great

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

The educating influence of the war had effected this great change. The widest interest and the most intense feeling had watched and waited for the seal of the final affirmative of the house upon the senate's proposition, which was inspired by the noblest sentiments of humanity. A great audience crowded the galleries and every place of access. The senators, members of the cabinet and judges of the supreme court were on the floor of the house also to watch the issue of the roll call. When the speaker announced the result, less than one-third against and more than two-thirds for, there was an uproar of delight. When this had lessened, Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, said: "In honor of this immortal and sublime event I move that the house do now adjourn." This commemorative motion passed with delighted approval. The requisite acceptance of the proposed amendment by the several states, and the official announcement of this fact by the Hon. William H. Seward, secretary of state, December 18, 1865, fixed the Thirteenth Amendment in majority contained earnest warnings against making a mistake, being too far in advance of the people, and against spoiling what they felt were unusually promising political prospects.

"Now, you see the strain. In a small way a slaveholder (no real pecuniary interest imperiled) representing a slave-holding and abolition-hating community, elected on the platform of 'the constitution as it is, the Union as it was,' knowing perfectly well what was right and what ought to be done, knowing that away down in the bottom of my heart I had always been against the institution, because I knew it was wrong; yet with a fair prospect of coming back to Congress if I voted against the amendment.

"This narration would not be truthful if I were to say that I did not hesitate. I claim no such credit. I was troubled, I thought much, and I felt much. There seemed to be an idea in the house that I was doubtful and was suffering a pretty severe ordeal. I must do opponents of the amendment the justice to say that not one of them approached me to 'talk it over.' Only one, Henry Winter Davis, came from the friends of the amendment. His manner was delicate, discreet and so extremely deferential, while earnest, that it convinced me he had read my thoughts in my countenance. He talked very much as he would to a friend in sorrow. I gently put him off with the assurance that I was considering the matter with all the care and earnestness a man could give to any question. Just because he had walked across the house to talk to me about it my pride prevented me from telling him that I had already found that I could not keep the peace with my own conscience, could not preserve my own self-respect, without voting in the affirmative. If I had frankly committed myself then it would have saved the next struggle.

"Doubt, hesitation, came again. It was positively painful. Walking the floor of my room at midnight, light and thoughts and resolution seemed to come as volunteers; and some of the thoughts were not very pleasant. One silent, unspoken soliloquy was as follows: 'What are you hesitating about? You know what is right. You know what you ought to do. You are discussing and weighing questions of expediency, questions personal to yourself. You are not really thinking about the question of freedom or slavery. You are a moral, a political coward.'

"It is no exaggeration to say that I felt as if I heard those very words. The die was cast; in another moment the Rubicon was passed. I stopped walking and stood still. With hand raised toward Heaven, I literally and verbally swore a political oath, that I would emancipate myself first, and then do what I could to emancipate other slaves.

"The rough material for my speech was soon put in form. The vote came soon after it was delivered. As soon as the count was announced there was a great uproar. Colfax ran across and threw his arms around my neck. Next day brought a manly and earnest letter of congratulation from Judge Holt, the first of dozens and hundreds. Mr. Seward afterwards conferred with me about going to Frankfort to get the amendment ratified by the Kentucky legislature. I told him it was no use, it could not be done.

"At the next election, August, 1865, I was beaten by only seven or eight hundred majority, showing that the people are sometimes better prepared for a forward move than is supposed."

the constitution, there to remain forever as the transplanted jewel of the Ordinance of 1787.

Let these events drop out now that have intervened, that we may see how close those men of '76 have come to us, and the part that they have played in our own lives. In a most real sense the men from the states which are within what was the Northwest Territory were soldiers of the Ordinance of 1787. More than a million soldiers came from those five great states, besides all those from Kansas and Nebraska, and from Oregon and California. We were among those soldiers, or else they were our comrades. So far as that million and more of men may have turned the scale of war, it was the ordinance that gave to their lives that result. To whatever extent the ordinance did that, to that extent our lives have been directly influenced by those men of '76 who were the ordinance. The ordinance itself was not a living force, and could not be till its articles of compact were put on as armor by those heroes of the Revolution. They carried its flag into the wilderness, and there they won new fields; and they are buried there. That was not, even for us, the last of them, I think. We read that when our Lord was crucified, the bodies of the saints that slept arose and went into the city. So (reverently) it seems to me that when Secession stretched upon its cross of war the Love of Freedom in this land of ours, those Revolutionary heroes came again, not to our sight as such, but as a million soldiers from those states from which they had secluded slavery; and in that guise they marched and fought with us, until there came upon the earth a new and risen Liberty that builds a broader and a higher peace.

Deep into its corner stone is cut the precept of the ordinance, that THERE SHALL BE NEITHER SLAVERY NOR INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE, EXCEPT AS A PUNISHMENT FOR CRIME.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND THE TRIAL OF THE ASSASSINS

BY GEN. HENRY L. BURNETT

Delivered before the Ohio Society of New York on April 18, 1892

I WAS serving with my regiment, the Second Ohio Cavalry, along the Cumberland in Southern Kentucky in the latter part of the year 1863, when the judge advocate on the staff of General Burnside, Major J. Madison Cutts (brother-in-law of the late Senator Douglas), committed an offense for which charges were preferred against him. General Burnside sent inquiries to the front for some officer who was a lawyer, and who could be recommended as capable of trying his judge advocate. I was recommended, and ordered back to Cincinnati, where General Burnside's headquarters then were, as commander of the Department of the Ohio.

After finishing this case, I was kept on court-martial duty at Cincinnati, Lexington and Louisville for some time, and finally, at the request of Governor Morton, in September, 1864, I was ordered to Indiana to act as judge advocate of the court detailed to try the members of the "Knights of the Golden Circle," or "Sons of Liberty." These trials were finished some time in December of that year, and I entered almost immediately upon the trial of the Chicago conspirators—St. Leger, Grenfel, and others—who had come over from Canada to engage in the enterprise of releasing the rebel prisoners then in Camp Douglas, near Chicago. While making the closing argument in this case, on the 17th of April, 1865, I received a dispatch from the secretary of war, directing me to report immediately to that department to aid in the examinations respecting the murder of the President.

I started for Washington the same evening, reached there on the morning of the 19th, and was "specially assigned by the secretary of war for duty on the investigation of the murder of President Lincoln and the attempted assassination of Mr. Seward," and a room was assigned to me in the War Department.

The gloom of that journey to Washington and the feeling of vague terror and sorrow with which I traversed its streets, I cannot adequately describe, and shall never forget. To this day, I never visit that city without some shadow of that dark time settling down over my spirit. All the public buildings and a large portion of the private houses were heavily draped in black. The people moved about the streets with bowed heads and sorrow stricken faces, as though some Herod had robbed each home of its first born. When men spoke to each other in the streets there were tremulous tones in their voices and a quivering of the lips, as though tears and violent expression of grief were held back only by great effort. In the faces of those in authority—cabinet ministers, officers of the army—there was an anxious expression of the eye as though a dagger's gleam in a strange hand was to be expected; and a pale determined expression, a set of the jaw that said: "The truth about this conspiracy shall be made clear and the assassins found and punished; we will stand guard and the government shall not die."

For no ruler that ever lived, I venture to say, not excepting Washington himself, was the love of the people so strong, so peculiarly personal and tender, as for Abraham Lincoln. Especially was this so among the soldiers; all members of the old army will remember with what devotion and patriotic affection the boys used to shout and sing, "We are coming, Father Abraham!" and will remember what a personal and confiding sort of relation seemed to exist between the boys and "Uncle Abe," and how those brave soldiers—veterans of four years of terrible war, inured to hardship, to sickness and wounds, familiar with the faces of death—wept like little children when told that "Uncle Abe" was dead. The scene at the bedside of the dying president had been described in the press, and as the news swept around the earth, all the children of men, in all the civilized world, wept with those about his couch. That death-bed scene will never be forgotten. It was surrounded by his cabinet ministers, all of whom were bathed in tears, not excepting Mr. Stanton, the war secretary, with iron will and nerve, who when informed by Surgeon-General Barnes that the president could not live until morning exclaimed: "Oh, no, General! No, no," and immediately sat down at his bedside and wept like a little child.

"Senator Sumner was seated on the right of the president's couch, near the head, holding the right hand of the president in his own. He was sobbing like a tender woman with his head bowed down almost to the pillow of the bed on which the president was lying."

At twenty-two minutes past seven the president passed away, and Mr. Stanton exclaimed: "Now he belongs to the ages." Besides the persons named, there were about the death-bed his wife and son, Vice-President Johnson, all the other members of the cabinet with the exception of Mr. Seward, Generals Halleck, Meigs, Farnsworth, Augur and Ladd, Rev. Dr. Gurley, Schuyler Colfax, Governor Farwell, Judges Cartter and Otto, Surgeon-General Barnes, Drs. Stone, Crane and Leals, Major John Hay and Maunsell B. Field.

When I entered upon the duty of assisting in the investigation of the murder of the president, on the 19th of April, it must be borne in mind that at that time it was not positively known who had assassinated the president, or attempted the life of Secretary Seward; Booth was the alleged assassin. How widespread was the conspiracy or who were in it, or of it, was not known.

There was general apprehension and belief that further assassinations would be attempted, and guards were placed around the private residences of the cabinet ministers, General Grant's house and the public buildings; soldiers patrolled the city and were scouring the country. All that was then positively known as to the assassination of the president, was that a tall dark man, apparently about thirty years of age, had forced his way into the president's box at Ford's Theatre on the evening of the 14th, had shot the president, stabbed Major Rathbone who attempted to detain him, had leaped over the front of the box on to the stage below, fled across it crying: "Sic semper tyrannis!"—then out by the right side to the rear door of the theatre, had there mounted a horse, galloped away into the night, crossing the navy yard bridge; that another supposed confederate soon after galloped after him and joined him, and this was the sum of the positive knowledge at that time.

Of that scene in the box at the theatre, and on that night, Nicolay and Hay, in the "Life of Lincoln," say: "The whole performance remains in the memory of those who heard it, a vague phantasmagoria, the actors the thinnest of spectres. The awful tragedy in the box makes everything else seem pale and unreal. Here were five human beings in a narrow space—the greatest man of his time in the glory of the most stupendous success in our history, the idolized chief of a nation already mighty, with illimitable vistas of grandeur to come; his beloved wife, proud and happy; a pair of betrothed lovers, with all the promise of felicity that youth, social position and wealth could give them; and this young actor, handsome as Endymion upon Latmus, the pet of his little world. The glitter of fame, happiness and ease was upon the entire group, but in an instant, everything was to be changed with the blinding swiftness of enchantment. Quick death was to come on the central figure of that company—the central figure, we believe, of the great and good men of the century. Over all the rest the blackest fates hovered menacingly—fates from which a mother might pray that kindly death would save her children in their infancy. One was to wander with the stain of murder on his soul, with the curses of a world upon his name, with a price set upon his head, in frightful physical pain, till he died a dog's death in a burning barn; the stricken wife was to pass the rest of her days in melancholy and madness; of these two young lovers, one was to slay the other and then end his life a raving maniac."

At the same hour that Booth fired the fatal shot, Payne appeared at the door of Secretary Seward's house, in the guise of a messenger from Dr. Vedi, holding in his hand the package that Booth had prepared for him, and demanded to see the secretary, saying that he had a verbal message which was of particular importance in regard to the use, or application of the medicine, and that he must see the secretary himself. Dr. Verdi had left his patient but a short time before, and had consoled the family that had for days been suffering the greatest anxiety on account of the secretary's condition, by taking a favorable view of the symptoms. The family, worn with watching and anxiety, were disposing themselves for the night. Major A. H. Seward had retired to his room. Sergeant George F. Robinson, acting as attendant nurse, was watching by the bedside in company with Miss Seward, the secretary's daughter. Frederick D. Seward occupied the room at the head of the stairs. All the rooms occupied by the secretary and his family were on the second floor, and were reached by a flight of stairs in the hallway.

The second waiter, William H. Bell, a colored lad of nineteen, was stationed at the hall door. Being somewhat relieved of their anxiety by the doctor's favorable view of the case, all were anticipating a night of quiet rest. The door bell rang and was responded to by Bell, the colored waiter. Immediately upon the opening of the door, Payne stepped into the hall. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, muscular man, as agile and ferocious as a panther; a low-browed, scowling, villainous-looking specimen of humanity, the animal preponderating largely in every feature of his visage and expression of his countenance. There he stood, holding in his left hand the package, and keeping his right hand in his overcoat pocket. He demanded of the boy to be allowed to see the secretary, telling his story about being sent by Dr. Verdi to deliver the medicine with his directions. The porter told him that his orders were to admit no one, and that he could not see Mr. Seward; that he would deliver the package himself. To this Payne would not consent, but persisted in saying that he must see Mr. Seward. After considerable parleying, he started upstairs, and the porter, seeing that he would go, and thinking that he might complain of his conduct to the secretary, asked him to pardon him, to which Payne replied: "Oh, I know; that's all right." He was wearing heavy boots and took no pains to walk lightly as he went up the stairs, whereupon the porter requested him not to make so much noise, to which, however, he paid no attention. As he approached the head of the stairs, he was met by Mr. Frederick Seward who had been attracted by the noise, to whom he said, "I want to see Mr. Seward." Frederick went into his father's room, and finding him asleep, returned saying, "You cannot see him." All this time Payne stood holding the package in his left hand, grasping with his right hand the pistol in his overcoat pocket. Frederick requested him to give him the package, saying he would deliver it; but Payne persisted in saying that that would not do, he must see Mr. Seward—he must see him. Frederick finally said, "I am proprietor here, and his son; if you cannot leave your message with me, you cannot leave it at all." Payne still continued parleying with Frederick for some time; but finding that his talking availed nothing, he started as if to go downstairs. This, however, was only a feint on his part in order to throw Frederick off his guard and to get rid of the porter who stood behind him. He again walked so heavily that the porter requested him not to make so much noise; but at that moment, Payne having prepared himself for the encounter, turned quickly, and making a spring towards Frederick, struck him two or three times with the pistol, which he had all the time held in his hand, fracturing his skull and knocking him senseless to the floor. Having learned which was the room occupied by the invalid by seeing Frederick go into it, Payne rushed past the prostrate man, opened the door of the secretary's room and was met by Sergeant Robinson.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Having broken and thrown down his revolver in his encounter with Frederick, he had drawn his dagger, and at his first encounter with the sergeant, he struck him with his knife, cutting an ugly gash in his forehead and partially knocking him down. He then pressed rapidly forward, knife in hand, to where the invalid lay in his bed. Throwing himself upon him, he commenced striking at his face and neck with his dagger. The secretary was reclining in a half sitting position, having the coverings well drawn up about his neck and chin, to which circumstance the failure of the would-be assassin to take his life was no doubt due. The sergeant, as soon as he recovered his equilibrium, sprang upon Payne, and Major Seward, having been awakened by the screams of his sister, sprang into the room in his night dress. Finding the sergeant grappling him in such a way as to hinder the effectiveness of his thrusts at the secretary, and probably thinking that he had accomplished his purpose, the assassin turned his attention toward making his escape. In disentangling himself from the grasp of the two men who now had hold of him, he gave Major Seward several severe cuts about the head and face, crying all the time, "I am mad! I am mad!" Finally tearing himself loose, he started to make his way to the street. Meeting a Mr. Emrick W. Hansel, another nurse, on the stairs, he made a thrust at him with his knife, inflicting an ugly wound. He now left the house, leaving five of the inmates stabbed, cut and bleeding behind him. Having reached the street, he deliberately threw his dagger away, mounted the horse which he had hitched in front of the door, and rode off.

After the attack at Secretary Seward's, Dr. Verdi and two or three other surgeons were at once called to examine and treat the secretary and the other victims of Payne's dagger. The house in which the onslaught was made had the appearance of a charnel-house or slaughter-pen. The secretary was found to have received three or four severe cuts about the face and neck, which were only made dangerous by the loss of blood they had occasioned and the weak condition of the patient.

The secretary made a slow but good recovery. Of the other four wounded men, the wounds of Mr. Frederick Seward proved the most serious, as his skull had been fractured and depressed, so as to render him unconscious, from which condition he was only recalled by a surgical operation. All finally recovered.

On the evening of the 14th, Booth had called at the Kirkwood House, where Vice-President Johnson was stopping, and left a card on which was written: "Don't wish to disturb you. Are you at home? J. Wilkes Booth."

On the evening of the 13th, a man appeared at Secretary Stanton's house, where General Grant was that evening, had asked to have both General Grant and Secretary Stanton pointed out to him, which was done. He did not speak to either of them, and lingered in the hall watching them and sat down on a step of the front steps until he was driven away. This was the sum of what was actually and positively known of the facts as to the assassination of the president, the attempted assassination of Secretary Seward, and the movements of the conspirators on the 19th.

As I have said before, while it was rumored and generally believed that J. Wilkes Booth was the assassin, for some days this rested only upon the statements of some of the persons at the theatre that they believed it was Booth; they thought they recognized him as he ran across the stage, but could not be certain about it. The first evidence which conclusively established his identity in the minds of those investigating the facts, was obtained about the 21st or 22d of April. It was known that the assassin had injured himself when he jumped from the president's box, that he limped as he ran across the stage, and it was subsequently ascertained that he had broken one bone of his left leg. He was traced to Dr. Mudd's house, near Bryantown, Maryland, and there, on the 21st, was secured the boot which Dr. Mudd had cut from his leg, when he set the bone. On the inside of the boot was the number of the boot and the name of the maker, and the words "J. Wilkes." As soon as the boot was received at the War Department, I had ex-Marshall Murray put aboard a special engine and sent to New York to look up the maker and ascertain for whom the boot was made. That night a telegram was received from him saying the boot was made for J. Wilkes Booth. This settled the identity of the assassin in our minds beyond all doubt, and was the basis on which we proceeded in our investigations as to who were the aiders and abettors of the assassin and who were his co-conspirators.

The investigation of the facts was prosecuted under the personal direction of the secretary of war with earnest diligence, until the day the court was ordered to convene, May 8th. A more indefatigable, tireless worker it has never been my fortune to encounter, either in military or civil life, than Secretary Stanton. Many nights I worked with him until the morning dawn began to steal in at the windows, and many nights I left the department at midnight or in the small hours of the early morning completely worn out, and I left him still there working.

Early in my work I had a personal experience with Secretary Stanton which illustrates some of his characteristics. Almost immediately after commencing my investigation, I learned that a Mr. Weichman and a Mr. Hollahan, who had been boarders with Mrs. Surratt, had been sent by the secretary to Canada to find John H. Suratt, whom the secretary believed to have been one of the conspirators, and if possible to bring him back to Washington. A few days after learning this fact, two men appeared at my office from the War Department, and announced themselves as Weichman and Hollahan. I wrote their names on a card and went to the secretary, announced their arrival and asked for instructions. He was busy and very briefly said, "Take their statements and have them report from day to day." This I wrote on the card and returned to my office. I then had their statements taken down stenographically and instructed them to report from day to day. That evening, I should think about twelve o'clock, a messenger appeared at my room at Willard's Hotel, Mr. Olcott, a special agent then at work on this investigation, and said to me: "The secretary wants you, and the devil is to pay." I said, "What is it?" He answered, "I don't know, but he is in a terrible temper." When I appeared before him, he was walking up and down his office apparently in a great state of excitement, and burst out with, "I hear that Weichman and Hollahan were in your office to-day and that you let them go." I said, "Yes, Mr. Secretary,—" I got no further when he broke in with, "You had no business to let these men go. They are some of the conspirators, and you have them here at this office by eight o'clock to-morrow morning, or I will deal with you." I again commenced, "But, Mr. Secretary,—" (intending to add that it was by his instructions) but he interrupted by saying, "Not a word, sir; you have those men here to-morrow morning by eight o'clock."

I saw there was no use to attempt any controversy with him or explain, so turned back and went into my office, a good deal dismayed and disheartened. I sat down at my desk, thinking what I should do. I then recalled one of the military maxims, that where a grave and important duty is imposed by a superior, the power is always equal to the duty, and I immediately sat down at my desk and wrote out an order to General Augur, who was then in command of the district at Washington, to at once detail a regiment to command and guard all the usual modes of ingress and egress to Washington, to examine every person who departed therefrom during the night or in the morning until further orders, and to carefully inspect each person departing, in order to find and bring to the War Department the next morning by eight o'clock the two men, Weichman and Hollahan, giving as near as I could a careful description of their persons. I further ordered him to detail two companies to report at once at the War Department for duty. When these companies arrived, I divided them into squads of ten each, in command of either a commissioned or non-commissioned officer, and commenced at the Georgetown Bridge to ring up and examine all the occupants on each street leading to the capitol, except of course, the residences of foreign diplomats and cabinet ministers, taking charge personally of one squad and one street. I directed them to report to me at Willard's at seven o'clock in the morning. At seven o'clock all my squads reported to me and reported an utter failure.

I then started up to the War Department as disheartened and discouraged a man as you could have found in the city of Washington to report to the secretary and take my medicine. Just as I was passing along diagonally in front of the presidential mansion, and nearly opposite General Augur's headquarters, I nearly ran into a man, and looking up discovered it was Weichman. I was almost overcome with conflicting emotions, threw my arms about him for a moment and then linked my arm in his and said, "Come with me." He was considerably surprised at my agitation, but made no objection, and we walked up towards the War Department. I inquired where he had slept the night before and where Hollahan was. He said that as he had formerly been employed in the quartermaster-general's office, some of the clerks had tendered bunks to himself and Hollahan for the night and they had both slept there. (It had never entered my head the night before to examine the military officers of the government.)

As soon as I reached my room I sent an orderly over to the Quartermaster Department and he returned almost immediately with Hollahan.

Putting them both in my room and putting a sentinel at the door so that they should not again vanish, I took the card that I had taken with me in my interview the day before with Mr. Stanton, and went into his room. It was then just about eight o'clock. As I came in, Mr. Stanton, who was then seated at his desk, looked up and said, "Well, have you those men?" I said, "Yes, Mr. Secretary, they are in my office." His whole manner and countenance changed from that of a grim sort of ill-nature to that of a pleased smile, and I said—I was then a good deal aroused and indignant—and I turned upon him and said, "And now, Mr. Stanton, I am through with the service under you and I beg here now to tender my resignation to take effect immediately. You would have condemned and disgraced me without a hearing for obeying your own order, and I am damned if I will serve further under any such man. Here is the card I brought in to you yesterday on which the names of these two witnesses were written, whose names I gave distinctly to you, and on it I wrote the order you gave me—namely, to take their statements, let them go, and have them report from day to day. Here it is, and this order I implicitly obeyed, now I am through with you and through with the service." He got up from his desk, came over to where I was standing, placing one hand on my shoulder and said, "General, I ask your pardon. I was wrong, but remember the great strain I am under in trying to save the country. In seeking to achieve the best and the public rights, sometimes individual right goes down. I am doing the best I can with all the power with which God has endowed me. Forget this matter and go back and go on with your work and help me and the great work I am trying to do."

Thus ended the matter so far as I was concerned, and I went back and went on with my work.

Prior to the first of May the president, Andrew Johnson, officially called upon the attorney-general, James Speed, for an opinion as to whether or not the persons implicated in the murder of the president and the attempted assassination of William H. Seward, secretary of state, and in an alleged conspiracy to assassinate other officers of the government, and their aiders and abettors, were lawfully triable before a military commission in Washington, and the attorney-general having given his opinion in response thereto, that the said parties were so lawfully triable, on the 1st day of May the president ordered the adjutant-general to detail nine competent military officers to serve as such commission. On the 6th of May the adjutant-general issued an order appointing a military commission to meet at Washington on the 8th of May for the trial of Herold, Atzerodt, Payne, O'Laughlin, Spangler, Arnold, Mrs. Surratt, Dr. Mudd, and such persons as might be brought before it implicated in the murder of the late President Abraham Lincoln, and the attempted assassination of Hon. William H. Seward, secretary of state, and in an alleged conspiracy to assassinate other officers of the federal government at Washington city, and their aiders and abettors.

The detail of the court was as follows: Maj.-Gen. David Hunter, Maj.-Gen. Lewis Wallace, Brevet Maj.-Gen. Augustus V. Kautz, Brig.-Gen. Albion P. Howe, Brig.-Gen. Albert S. Foster, Brig.-Gen. T. M. Harris, Brevet Brig.-Gen. James A. Ekin, Col. C. H. Tompkins, Lieut.-Col. David T. Clendenin.

Brig.-Gen. Joseph Holt was appointed judge advocate and recorder of the commission, and the Hon. John A. Bingham and myself were assigned as assistants or special judge advocates.

The court convened on the 9th of May, but adjourned to the 11th, to afford the accused an opportunity to procure counsel. The charge against the accused was for conspiracy in aid of the existing rebellion against the government with Booth, Surratt, Jefferson Davis, Saunders, Tucker, Thompson, Cleary, Clay, Harper, Young and others unknown, to kill and murder Abraham Lincoln, president of the United States, and commander-in-chief of the army, and Andrew Johnson, then vice-president, W. H. Seward, secretary of state, and General Grant.

The specifications set forth the act or acts of the accused, done and performed in the prosecution of said conspiracy.

It is not my purpose to review the history and scope of the conspiracy as developed by the proof submitted to the Court. It is sufficient for the purpose of this paper to say that nine brave soldiers and intelligent and conscientious officers, after two months of careful and laborious investigation, did find and decide that the accused, together with Surratt, Booth, Jefferson Davis and his rebel agents and confederates then in Canada, namely, George N. Saunders, Beverly Tucker, Jacob Thompson, William C. Cleary, Clement C. Clay, George Harper and George Young, were guilty of conspiring to kill and murder President Lincoln, Vice-President Johnson, Secretary Seward and General Grant. It should be remembered also in this connection, that during all the two months of this investigation by the commission, each of the accused were represented by one or more able counsel, among whom were the Hon. Beverly Johnson, of Maryland; Gen. Thomas Ewing, then of Washington; Frederick A. Aiken, W. E. Foster, Walter S. Cox and Frederick Stone, and that the whole power of the government was put at the service of the accused and used unreservedly by their counsel to bring from any part of the United States any witnesses they might desire.

Some of the counsel for the accused seemed to be as much convinced as the court of the guilty participation of the rebel authorities at Richmond and their confederates in Canada in the conspiracy to assassinate President Lincoln. Cox said in his argument, "the assassination of the president and other heads of government may have been discussed in the South, as a measure of ultimate resort to retrieve the fortunes of the Confederacy when at their lowest ebb; the rebel agents in Canada may have individually signified their approval of the measure in the abstract, long since; but I undertake to maintain upon the evidence that there never was any final determination, on the part of any person or persons, with whom any of these accused can possibly be connected, actually to attempt the life of the president or other functionary until a few days—about one week—before the murder.” Again he says, speaking of Booth, “The theory of the prosecution is that Booth, who is acknowledged to have been the head and front and soul of the conspiracy, if there was one, was only the hireling tool of these rebel emissaries; I think he was probably something more, but it will not vary the result. I think he was probably actuated, not only by the sordid hope of gain, but by a misguided, perverted ambition. Of strong will and passions, and high nervous organization, accustomed to play parts and those of a tragic character, he had contracted perverted and artificial views of life and duty, and had aspired to be the Brutus in real life that he had been or seen on the boards. He well knew, however, that the act he contemplated would be execrated all the world over, except possibly among those whom he intended to serve. Therefore, whether pecuniary reward or false glory was his object, he could hope for neither until he was secure of their approbation. Whatever his principle of action, he was wholly without motive for so desperate an undertaking until he supposed he had the approval of the rebel authorities. When does the evidence show this was given?”

Mr. Cox then proceeds to review the testimony, or a portion of it, given upon this point, and adds, “Thus, in the end there is seen to be a substantial accord between all the three witnesses, on the important question when the formal sanction of the Richmond authorities was received in Canada, and when consequently for the first time they were in a condition to give their formal and official approval to the proposed assassination.”

Let me say here personally, after this quotation from the argument of counsel for the accused themselves, that my own judgment upon the testimony was at the time that while the proposed enterprise of assassinating the president and vice-president, members of the cabinet and General Grant had been brought to the attention of the Richmond authorities and to Jefferson Davis, there was no conclusive evidence to show that Davis sanctioned or approved this undertaking. The proof, I think, also shows that it was brought to his attention and that he did not condemn or undertake to suppress the movement. That the confederate agents in Canada did actually take part in fomenting and forwarding the conspiracy, I think was conclusively established.

As early as November, 1864, Booth was considering wild schemes either of forcible abduction of the president or assassination, and was busy from that time down to the day of the assassination in trying to enlist others in the devilish enterprise.

It is part of the unwritten history of the time that on the day of President Lincoln's second inauguration, and while he was delivering his inaugural address, Booth sat near and just behind him with the purpose to stab him to death then and there if any fit opportunity should occur in the press and confusion of the crowd, for him to do the deed and make his escape. That while the great president was uttering those immortal words, "With malice toward none, with charity for all," this armed assassin was near his side clutching the knife with which to stab him to death. Another curious fact connected with this event is that Booth secured his ticket of admission to these ceremonies through a United States senator, one of the most faithful and earnest of the Union republican group, and that it was procured through the intercession of his daughter, who, although she had only a casual acquaintance with Booth, had often seen him on the stage, and, like many of the romantic young ladies of our own time, had caught the fever of stage-hero worship.

Later on in the same month of November, an actual movement was made to forcibly abduct or assassinate the president. About the 20th of that month a party of seven armed and mounted men, four of whom were Booth, Surratt, Payne and Atzerodt, appeared at Mrs. Surratt's house and rode away on some desperate enterprise—alleged to have been the capture of the president on his way to or coming from the Soldiers' Home, and delivering him into the hands of the rebels. Through some cause not known, the plan was frustrated, and Booth, Payne and Surratt returned to Mrs. Surratt's house very much excited and angered over their failure. Surratt threatened to shoot any one who approached his room, uttering wild exclamations that his prospects were gone, his hopes were blighted. In the afternoon, after Surratt and his party had departed on this enterprise, Mrs. Surratt was found in the hall or passage-way of her house weeping bitterly, and said to one who attempted to console her, "John is gone away!" grieving as though he was not to return, and showing some knowledge of the expedition.

About the 1st of April, 1865, Booth went to New York and returned to Washington on the 8th, and from that time was busy with his confederates in maturing his plans for the proposed assassination of President Lincoln and the others. I do not propose to give you the evidence submitted to the court bearing upon the general conspiracy and the act of assassination and the connection of each of the accused therewith, further than to give briefly the circumstances of the assassination of the president.

On the evening of the 14th of April, 1865, Major Rathbone and Miss Harris, of Washington, joined the president and Mrs. Lincoln and drove with them in the president's carriage to Ford's Theatre, reaching there about half-past eight. When the president reached the theatre and the fact became known, the actors stopped playing, the band struck up "Hail to the Chief," and the audience rose and received him with cheers and shouts of applause. The party passed to the right into the president's box in the second tier which was on the left of the stage. The president seated himself in an arm chair, which had been provided for him that afternoon by Mr. Ford, to the left of the box and nearest the audience. Mrs. Lincoln sat next on the right of the president and on her right was Miss Harris, and immediately behind her sat Major Rathbone.

About nine o'clock of that evening Booth rode into the alley in the rear of the theatre and called upon Spangler, a stage carpenter employe of the theatre, to hold his horse. Spangler sent a young man named Burrows, another employe. Booth stepped into the theatre through the rear door, took a brief survey of the house, passed out the same way, and soon after appeared at the front. There he held a private and hurried conversation with two or three persons. Just before ten o'clock he went into a saloon near the theatre and took a drink of whiskey. He then came out and joined his confederates, the parties he had been conversing with, and then passed into the passage leading to the stage from the street. At this time, one of the confederates stepped into the vestibule of the theatre, looked at the clock, came out and called the time, started up the street, was gone a few minutes, returned, looked at the clock, and called the time again. By this time Booth had reappeared in front of the theatre. Presently the same party who had called the time came and looked at the clock and called the time again in a loud voice, "ten minutes past ten." He then started up the street and Booth passed into the theatre. As stated, this was about ten minutes past ten o'clock, and was during the second scene of the third act of "Our American Cousin," then being performed by Laura Keene and her company at Ford's Theatre. Booth passed to the right up near to the president's box, where he stopped a moment and leaned against the wall. He then stepped down one step, placed his hand on the door of the passage leading to the president's box and his knee against it, and pushed the door open. He then placed a brace against the door on the inside, which had previously been prepared, whether by him or some one of his confederates for the purpose of preventing an entrance or intrusion from the outside; passed along the passage way to the door on the left opening into the president's box, stopped and looked through a hole which had been cut in the door to see the president's position, and if his attention was concentrated upon the stage; softly pushed the door open and entered, no one observing him; then, standing within two or three feet of the president, fired. The ball entered the back part of the left side of the head of the president. The pistol used was a large sized Derringer, about six inches in length, carrying a large hand-made ball. Upon hearing the discharge of the pistol, Major Rathbone looked around and saw through the smoke a man between the door and the president. At the same time he heard the man shout some word which he thought was "freedom." Another witness thought he shouted "Revenge for the South!" Booth, the moment he fired, dropped his pistol and drew a long knife. Major Rathbone instantly sprang upon him and seized him. Booth wrested himself from the major's grasp, and made a violent thrust at his breast with the knife, which Rathbone parried, receiving the wound in his left arm between the elbow and the shoulder, about one and one-half inches deep and several inches in length. Booth then rushed to the front of the box, Major Rathbone attempting to seize him again, but only caught his clothes as he was going over the railing. Booth put his left hand on the railing, holding in his right hand the knife, point downward, leaped over and down to the stage, about twelve feet. As he was going over or descending the spur on his right foot caught in the flag, which had been draped in front of the president's box in honor of his presence, and clung to it, causing his left foot to partially turn under him as he struck the stage, and thereby one of the bones of his left leg was broken. Had it not been for this accident Booth doubtless would have made his escape into Virginia within the confederate lines, possibly out of the country. Thus it was that the national flag was a mute instrument in the vengeance that overtook the president's murderer. Booth, as he fled across the stage, partially turned facing the audience, threw up his hand holding the gleaming knife, and shouted "Sic semper tyrannis!"

In taking the statements of persons at the theatre who had witnessed the tragedy, an Irishman in the second row said that Booth shouted as he fled across the stage, "Am sick; send for McManus!"

Booth passed out by the right side of the stage and through the passage in the rear of the theatre, mounted his horse, which Burrows was still holding, hit him a blow with the handle of his knife, fled across the navy yard bridge, and arrived at Lloyd's tavern, Maryland, about twelve o'clock at night. On the way he had been joined by Herold.

Stopping at Lloyd's tavern in Surrattsville, Herold dismounted and went into the house, saying to Lloyd, "For God's sake, make haste and get those things!" Lloyd, understanding what he wanted from the notification given him by Mrs. Surratt on the day previous, without making any reply went and got the carbines which he had placed in his bedroom that they might be handy, and brought them to Herold together with the ammunition and field glass that had been deposited with him, and the two bottles of whiskey that Booth had ordered through Mrs. Surratt the day before. Herold carried out to Booth one of the bottles of whiskey, drinking from his own bottle in the house before going out. Booth declined taking his carbine, saying his leg was broken and he could not carry it. As they were about leaving Booth said to Lloyd, "I will tell you some news if you want to hear it. I am pretty certain that we have assassinated the president and Secretary Seward." The moon was now up and shining brightly. The next heard of them was at the house of Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, near Bryantown, in Maryland, and about thirty miles from Washington, where they arrived at about four o'clock on the morning of the 15th.

Booth's leg had been broken by a fracture of the fibula, or small bone of the left leg, when he fell on the stage on leaping from the president's box, and by this time had become very painful. He needed rest and surgical treatment, but he could get neither; for although he had reached the house of a co-conspirator, who was a country doctor, and well disposed to render him all the aid he could, he appeared to have made a very bungling operation, dressing the broken limb with some pasteboard and a bandage which gave but a very imperfect support. As to the rest he required, that was impossible, for although Mudd placed him in an upstairs room and kept him until the afternoon, he was admonished by seeing a squad of soldiers under Lieutenant Dana passing down past Mudd's place, which was a quarter of a mile off the road to Bryantown, that there was no rest for him; and as quickly as it could be done, after the soldiers passed, Mudd got rid of his dangerous charges by sending them by an unfrequented route to the house of his friend and neighbor, Samuel Cox, about six miles nearer to the Potomac. Booth was on no new ground; neither amongst strangers either to his person or to his wicked purpose. He had spent a good deal of his time during the previous fall in that part of Maryland, preparing a way for his escape after accomplishing his purpose. His way had seemed clear to him in advance; his route had been selected; his friendly acquaintanceships secured. But alas! the broken leg. Under the guise of looking at the country with a desire to purchase lands, he had perfected all his arrangements and had expected to pass swiftly over his route, accompanied by Atzerodt (whose home was in their neighborhood and who knew all about the contraband trade with the rebel capital, the underground mail route between Richmond and Washington, and all of the people engaged in these operations and also the place and facilities for crossing the Potomac), and also by Payne and Herold. He had purposed to be safe on the soil of the Old Dominion ere this time. Instead of realizing all this, he found himself a cripple, scarcely able to travel, and closely pursued by those whom he knew to be on his trail, with no other companion than his devoted but inefficient friend Herold.

Mudd had done all he could to relieve him, but dare not try to conceal and keep him. He could only forward him to the next stage of his journey and to a safe place of concealment. This he faithfully did. Cox lived near Port Tobacco, the home of Atzerodt; and as his was too public a place to afford safety to the fugitives, he turned them over to his neighbor, Thomas Jones, a contraband trader between Maryland and Richmond, who, in the midst of a constant scouring of the country by pursuing parties, kept his charges concealed in the woods near his house, supplying them with food and doing everything he could for their comfort, waiting and watching constantly to find an opportunity to get them across the Potomac. They were hunted so closely that they could hear the neighing of the horses of the troopers, and fearing they might be betrayed by their horses answering the calls, Herold led them into a swamp near where they lay concealed in the pines and shot them.

The river was being continually patrolled by gunboats, and the task of getting his wards across proved both difficult and dangerous to Jones. The proclamations offering one hundred thousand dollars for the capture of Booth and warning all persons from aiding the fugitives in any way in making their escape had been published broadcast, yet Jones was true to his trust. Neither the offered rewards nor the warnings of the proclamation had any effect on him; for a whole week he kept them secreted in the pines on his premises, where Booth lay night and day wrapped in a pair of blankets that had most likely been furnished him by Dr. Mudd. Finally, being furnished by Jones with a boat, they took their own risks and effected a crossing; but they were seen by a colored man through whose report General Baker got on their track and finally effected their capture.

There can be no doubt that Booth had selected this as the route for his escape months before, and that all of his visits to this part of Maryland had been made with reference to this plan. Being at length across the Potomac, even though under such unfavorable auspices, Booth no doubt drew a free and exultant breath at having been permitted to set his foot at last on the soil of the Old Dominion. He felt that he was now amongst friends who would aid him in his flight or help him by concealment, and his friend Jones no doubt breathed with a freedom he had not known for some days at finding himself relieved from his dangerous charge. Booth was greatly disappointed at the cold reception given him by the people on whom he had counted so much after crossing into Virginia. He had expected to be lionized and honored as the hero of the age; but instead of that he received a comparatively cold reception that stung his vanity like the poison of an asp.

It is true the people showed no disposition to betray him; but, at the same time, they manifested a disposition to enter into no compromising friendship with him, and in a limited way only to assume any responsibility in his behalf by helping him to escape. Sad, indeed, was Booth's condition at this time. More than a week had elapsed since he had perpetrated his great crime and commenced his guilty flight; and now he found himself on foot, so lame and in such pain as scarcely to be able to walk a step, even with the help of a crutch, and scarcely more than fifty miles from his starting point. His companion in crime, Herold, was now the only human being on whose friendship and fidelity he could certainly rely.

By the aid of this blind follower he was able to maintain his concealment, and after a wretched fashion to resume his flight in an old wagon drawn by two miserable horses and driven by a negro. In this state he reached Port Conway, on the Rappahannock, in King George county, Virginia. Here his driver refused to take him further. It is just at this juncture and in this dilemma that they were met by three confederate soldiers, Major Ruggles, Lieutenant Bainbridge and Captain William Jett, the latter of Moseby's command.

Herold, thinking they were recruiting for the rebel service, was quick to see in them a means of assistance in getting South and under the protection of the stars and bars, and so revealed their identity, appealing to them for assistance. A little later, Booth getting out of the wretched conveyance, came forward, and to assure himself of their disposition toward him, accosted them with the interrogatory, "I suppose you have been told who we are?" Then throwing himself back on his crutch, and straightening himself up, with pistol cocked and drawn, he said, "Yes, I am Wilkes Booth, the slayer of Abraham Lincoln, and I am worth just one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars to the man that captures me." His attitude and speech was dramatic and that of a man at bay, under the power of a desperate purpose never to be taken alive. These three officers of the confederate army (for they were such at this time, not having been paroled), whilst mildly protesting that they did not sanction his acts as an assassin, assured him that they did not want any blood money, and promised to render him all the assistance in their power in making his escape, a promise which they faithfully kept. Major Ruggles dismounted and placed Booth on his horse, when the whole party crossed over the Rappahannock from Port Conway, in King George county, to Port Royal, in Caroline County, Virginia, and after an ineffectual effort to find quarters for Booth in the town, they took him three miles on the road to Bowling Green, the county seat of the latter county, where they succeeded in getting a man by the name of Garrett to take him in, with the understanding that he would do all he could for his comfort and safety. Garrett took Booth and Herold in with a full knowledge of all the facts in the case, and with some manifest reluctance from a knowledge of the danger he would thus incur.

Bainbridge went on to Bowling Green, whilst Ruggles and Jett remained over night in the woods near the house, Booth being hidden on the premises and cared for. On the following day Captain Jett went to Bowling Green on a visit, prompted by the tender passion, where he remained a few days, and Lieutenant Bainbridge returned to the Garrett farm, where he rejoined Major Ruggles. The two started for Port Conway, but before getting there learned that the town was full of Union cavalry, when they lost no time in returning to Garrett's and gave warning to Booth, advising him to lose no time in fleeing to a piece of woods, which they pointed out to him, and then turned to look after their own safety. The cavalry of which they got this notice was a squad detailed from the Sixteenth New York Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Dougherty, which had been ordered to report to Gen. L. C. Baker of the Secret Service Department.

Arriving at Port Conway on the afternoon of the day subsequent to the crossing of the parties above referred to, and finding the wife of the ferry keeper at the ferry house sitting and conversing with another woman, Colonel Conger exhibited to them a photograph of Booth, and informed them that that was the man they wanted. It at once became apparent to him, from the manner and actions of the women, that Booth was not far off. The ferryman, a man by the name of Collins, was sent for, and being influenced no doubt by fear of compromising himself, became very communicative. He told them all about the party that had crossed the day before, one of them, Captain Jett, he knew well; and knowing that Jett had been paying attention to a Miss Goldman, the daughter of a Bowling Green hotel keeper, he suggested that he would most probably be found there. Colonel Conger pushed on with his squad of cavalry, commanded by Captain, then Lieutenant E. P. Dougherty, to Bowling Green, passing the Garrett farm after dark.

Arriving at Goldman's Hotel, he inquired of Mrs. Goldman as to the men that were in the house. She answered him that her wounded son was in a room upstairs, and that he was all the man there was there. Colonel Conger then required her to lead the way upstairs, telling her at the same time that if his men were fired on he would burn the building and carry the inmates to Washington as prisoners. As he entered the room which she showed him, up one flight of stairs, Captain Jett jumped out of bed half-dressed, and admitted his identity. Colonel Conger then informed him that he was cognizant of his movements for the last two days, and proceeded to read to him the proclamations of the secretary of war, telling him when he had done reading it that if he did not tell him the truth he would hang him; but that if he truly gave him the information that he sought he would protect him. Jett was greatly excited, and told him that he had left Booth at the Garrett farm, three miles from Port Royal. The colonel then had Jett's horse taken from the stable, making Jett his unwilling guide to the place of Booth's concealment.

Arriving at Garrett's, the cavalry was so disposed as to prevent any one from escaping, and after having extorted, by threats, the information that Booth and Herold were concealed in the barn, it was at once surrounded. They were ordered to come out and surrender themselves, which Booth refused to do. After a considerable parley, Herold came to the door and gave himself up. He was followed by the maledictions of Booth. Booth still refused to surrender. A wisp of hay was fired and thrown in on the hay in the barn. From this start the barn was soon lighted up with the flames of the burning hay. Booth was known to be armed and desperate, and as the burning hay began to illuminate the barn he was seen, carbine in hand, peering through the cracks, and trying to get an aim. He had before offered to fight the crowd for a chance of his life if the colonel would but withdraw his men one hundred yards. Being answered that they had come to capture him, not to fight him, he was preparing to sell his life as dearly as possible. At this moment, Sergeant Boston Corbett, of the Sixteenth New York Cavalry, fired at Booth through a crack in the barn, upon his own responsibility. The bullet struck Booth on the back of his head, very nearly in the same part where his own ball struck the President, only a little lower down, and passing obliquely through the base of the brain and upper part of the spinal cord, it produced instantly almost complete paralysis of every muscle in his body below the wound, the nerves of organic life only sufficing to keep up a very difficult and imperfect respiration, and a feeble action of the heart for a few hours. After Booth was shot he was carried from the burning barn and laid under the shade of a tree on the lawn of the Garrett premises. He was perfectly clear in his mind, but could not swallow, and was scarcely able to articulate so as to be understood, although he seemed anxious to talk. He requested the officer who was bending over him trying to administer to him to tell his mother that he died for his country. Booth expired in great agony on the 26th of April, twelve days after the commission of his crime.

The body was brought to Washington and identified fully. It was buried for a time secretly under the floor of the old Capitol prison, but afterwards was given to his friends and taken to Baltimore and there buried in an unknown and unmarked grave.

At the moment the President was shot he was leaning with his hand or arm resting on the railing of the box, looking at some person in the orchestra, holding the flag aside to look between it and the post; he raised his head an instant and then it fell backward. He was carried to the residence of Mr. Peterson, just opposite the theatre, where he expired about seven o'clock on the morning of the 15th.

The trial of the accused occupied the commission from the 10th day of May to the 30th day of June, inclusive, and resulted in the conviction of Herold, Atzerodt, Payne and Mrs. Surratt, and their sentence to be hanged at such time and place as the President might direct; and the conviction of O'Loughlin, Spangler, Arnold and Mudd, and the sentence of all except Spangler to imprisonment at hard labor for life. On July 5, 1865, these sentences were approved by President Johnson, and the sentences of Herold, Atzerodt, Payne and Mrs. Surratt were ordered to be carried into effect on the 7th of the same month, between the hours of ten o'clock a. m. and two o'clock p. m.

On the morning of the 7th a writ of habeas corpus, issued by Justice Wylie, of the Supreme Court, of the District of Columbia, was served upon General Hancock, commanding him to produce before his honor the body of Mrs. Surratt. Justice Wylie signed the order for the issuance of the writ at ten o'clock in the morning, and at half-past eleven General Hancock appeared in person, accompanied by Attorney-General Speed, before his honor, and submitted the following return:

"I hereby acknowledge the service of the writ hereto attached and return the same, and respectfully say that the body of Mary E. Surratt is in my possession, under and by virtue of an order of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States and Commander of the Army and Navy, for the purpose in said order expressed, a copy of which is hereto attached, etc., and that I do not produce said body by reason of the order of the President of the United States, indorsed upon said writ, to which reference is hereby respectfully made."

The President's endorsement was:

"I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby declare that the writ of habeas corpus has been heretofore suspended in such cases as this, and I do hereby especially suspend this writ and direct that you proceed to execute the order heretofore given upon the judgment of the military commission, and you will give this order in return to the writ."

The court ruled that it yielded to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by the President, and the sentences were duly carried into execution.

No trial which ever took place in this country excited so much interest throughout the whole land as did the trial of these conspirators and assassins. Not only because of the great love of the people for Abraham Lincoln, but from a natural desire to learn from sworn testimony how widespread was the conspiracy, what was its scope and purpose, who actually took part in carrying it into execution, and how far the rebel authorities in Richmond and their agents in Canada had knowledge of the proposed assassination of the heads of the government, sanctioned it, aided it, and were responsible for it. Perhaps some additional interest was excited by the fact that a woman was charged with being one of the conspirators.

For this trial, and especially for the trial and execution of Mrs. Surratt, that portion of the press and the persons in sympathy with the late rebellion indulged in most bitter denunciations of the court; the judge advocates; General Hartranft, who was in immediate command of the detail having the prisoners in charge, and who carried into execution the sentence of the court; and of General Hancock, who was in command of the military forces in and around Washington. No falsehood was too extravagant to be imagined, stated and believed. As an illustration of this, I remember once, in passing along a street in Cincinnati, when a lady beside whom was standing one of these rebel sympathizers honored me with a bow and a pleasant smile. The gentleman turned to her and said, "Do you know who that is you have just bowed to?" "Oh yes, very well," she said. "Well, do you know that he hung Mrs. Surratt with his own hand, and smiled as he came down from the scaffold?"

The fact being that I never saw one of the accused after the close of the trial on the 30th of June, and that I left Washington soon after the close of the trial, I think on the 5th of July. But as illustrating still further the malicious representations that followed this trial, let me recall to your minds the letter of Mrs. Jane Swisshelm, published in the New York Tribune of September 16, 1873. In this letter she gives the impression that Mrs. Surratt was manacled in court during her trial, and vividly pictures how on one occasion she (Mrs. Swisshelm) was present in the court, and gave public exhibitions of her suffering and indignation at this outrage and cruelty. The Washington Chronicle, noticing this letter of Mrs. Swisshelm's, addressed a note to Mrs. Surratt's counsel, M. Aiken, making inquiry as to the fact. He replied as follows:

"I have your letter of this date, inclosing the letter of Jane G. Swisshelm, published in the Tribune, the 16th inst., and asking me, 'Is her statement true that Mrs. Surratt was manacled during her trial?' Without reference to any other fact, or to any of the details of the case of that most unfortunate lady, I have to say in reply that at no time during her unlawful trial was Mrs. Surratt manacled, either on her wrists or her ankles, while in the presence of the court. I not only speak from my own absolute knowledge, but from recollections of Mrs. Surratt's oft-repeated statements to me that she was not manacled."

The Chronicle adds, "Now, can any fair-minded person, however prejudiced, come to any other conclusion than that the garrulous lady had willfully and maliciously misrepresented the facts for the mere purpose of glorifying herself?" I must agree with this conclusion because I know personally that Mrs. Surratt was not manacled, and that no such scene as Mrs. Swisshelm described ever took place in the courtroom. But this letter of Mrs. Surratt's counsel did not put underground the falsehood that she was manacled during her trial—periodically it reappears, fresh and vigorous.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

General Hancock was especially denounced because he was obedient to the order of the President—the Commander-in-Chief of the Army under the constitution—and had failed to deliver Mrs. Surratt over to the custody of the court under the habeas corpus proceedings. His rivals and enemies made most unscrupulous use of this weapon against him as soon as he became prominently talked of as Democratic candidate for President in 1880.

In 1871 one of the leading papers of St. Louis said: "Quite a number of the federal officers, dissatisfied with the political character and partisan purposes of the late war, resigned their positions in the army at one time or another. Some of them felt that the 'Union' had somehow come to be a secondary consideration in the fight; others, that it was a merely partisan struggle for the ascendancy; but General Hancock, the favorite of a few Western Democrats as a candidate for President, seems to have detected none of these objections. He did his duty like a stolid serving-man through the war. When at New Orleans, he issued an order that made his great capital among the Southern people; and, when at the North, he distinguished himself equally as a federal zealot. It was General Hancock, then in command of the Middle Military Division of Washington, who declined to interfere with the order of the court-martial sentencing Mrs. Surratt to death. It was he who became himself party to one of the most inhuman crimes ever perpetrated in the name of justice."

This sort of criticism and abuse embittered many an hour of General Hancock's life up to the day of his death. General Hancock, as we all know who knew him well, in his personal relations with his fellow-men was as kindly and gentle as a child; was a man with the highest ideals and rules of conduct, and as a soldier was as brave and knightly as ever buckled sword.

Of a peculiarly proud and sensitive disposition, any word which assailed either his personal honor or his record as a soldier tortured him like a festering wound.

He talked with me several times about these attacks which had been made upon him, and in 1873 I determined to write an article reviewing some of the incidents of the trial of the assassins and General Hancock's relation to it. This purpose I made known to him; and he then informed me that an article had been prepared by some friend of his upon the subject, and if I wished he would have it sent to me, and I could make such use of it in the preparation of my article as I wished. It was subsequently sent to me, and I still have it in my possession. About the same time I received from him the following note:

"NEW YORK, October 1, 1873.

"My Dear General: General Mitchell has the paper I spoke to you of. It reached me this a. m. If you will notify General M. (W. G. Mitchell) where to send it and when, he will send it by messenger to you.

"The latter part of the paper contains the matter I particularly desire you to see, although it might be well for you to read the whole. You are at liberty to use any part of it verbatim or nil. It was not printed. I should be pleased if you would preserve the paper for me.

“I leave for St. Louis this p. m. The only true plan is to meet and crush out this Surratt matter, not to ‘dally it’—as this paper, for example. It is about my idea of meeting the question.

Yours truly,

“WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

“To General Burnett, N. Y.”

This paper is too long to present here, but I will give only a few extracts showing General Hancock’s views of his relation to the habeas corpus episode and Mrs. Surratt’s connection with the conspiracy. I quote from the paper as follows:

“On the 7th day of July, 1865, the day of the execution, the Honorable Andrew Wylie, a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, issued a writ of habeas corpus directed to General Hancock, commanding him to produce the body of Mary E. Surratt in court. Thereupon Andrew Johnson, as President of the United States, and as such superior in authority to General Hancock, assumed the responsibility of suspending the writ of habeas corpus and setting aside the order of the judge. The President’s order was in these words, and was indorsed on the writ of habeas corpus. (Here is given the President’s order, as given above.)

“Nevertheless, General Hancock deemed it his duty to appear before Judge Wylie and submit himself to the judgment of the civil court. Having appeared before the civil court, General Hancock filed the following statement in writing, in obedience to the command of the writ of habeas corpus, setting out the return above.

“Judge Wylie said: ‘The court finds itself powerless to take any further action in the premises, and therefore declines to make an order, which would be vain for any practical purpose. As regards the delay, it having been fully accounted for, the court has no fault to attach to the respondent (General Hancock) in that respect.’

“Against such a record as this nothing but inveterate malice would prefer a censure against General Hancock. The conduct of General Hancock was not only dutiful and obedient to the civil authority, but such as to manifest for that authority profound respect and reverence.

“It was not necessary he should appear in person before the court. He went, however, laid aside the sword, and submitted himself to its judgment. He could have assumed an air of defiance. He could have spurned the puny power of the civil magistrate, who had presumed to send his mandate to a military commander of a hundred thousand soldiers. But no, he deemed it an imperative duty to submit himself personally to the authority and jurisdiction of the court.

“If General Hancock was responsible for the non-production of the body of Mrs. Surratt, the Court was armed with jurisdiction to fine and imprison him for the dereliction of duty and for a contempt of the authority of the court.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“But the court did neither. Judge Wylie dismissed the general from his court without punishment and without censure; assigning the failure of the writ, not to an act of General Hancock, but to the act of the President. . . . The suggestion that General Hancock should have resigned is simply silly. His resignation could have no tendency to bring the body of Mrs. Surratt into court or to prevent her execution. . . .

“It has been a common thing for those who, from political partisanship or personal malice, have been most violent in their clamor against General Hancock in this connection, to omit all mention of the other parties who suffered with Mrs. Surratt. It would seem as if, in their opinion, no inhuman crime was perpetrated in the execution of Herold, Atzerodt or Payne. The reason for this is plain enough. There is always sympathy for a woman. And it is supposed that much will be conceded for her which could not be asked in the case of another person. It is quite immaterial to our present purpose whether Mrs. Surratt was innocent or guilty of the crime for which she suffered, since General Hancock was in no wise responsible for it. But when she is pronounced perfectly innocent and her execution ‘an inhuman murder’ committed by nine respectable officers of the army, and by the approbation of the President, without evidence of guilt, it is not amiss to state the simple facts of her case.

“That nine men of ordinary respectable character in the federal army, colonels, brigadiers and major-generals, should have been so lost to all sense of duty and humanity, so ineffably brutal, as to sentence a woman to death for nothing, is a very strong proposition.

“Any one who looks into the evidence will find out that for some weeks before the assassination Mrs. Surratt was holding frequent private interviews with Wilkes Booth; and was also on terms of intimate communication in her own house with Lewis Payne, alias Wood, alias Powell, who attempted the life of Mr. Seward. Some weeks before the assassination, John H. Surratt, David E. Herold and George A. Atzerodt left at the house of a Mr. Floyd, near Washington, two carbines, ammunition, and a rope sixteen to twenty feet long, which were laid away under a joist until they should be wanted. On the Monday preceding the assassination Mrs. Surratt came to Floyd’s house and inquired about the ‘shooting-irons,’ and told Floyd ‘they would be wanted soon.’ On the very day of the assassination Mrs. Surratt was at Floyd’s house again, and told him ‘to have the shooting-irons ready for that night.’ She then gave Mr. Floyd a field-glass and asked him to have all the things ready, with two bottles of whiskey, for the parties who would call for them in the night, and left.

“True to her prediction, at about a quarter-past twelve o’clock the same night, Booth and Herold came to Floyd’s and called for the carbines, field-glass and whiskey, which Floyd delivered to them according to Mrs. Surratt’s directions. Herold took his carbine, but Booth was unable to carry his, having a broken leg, and so left it behind. The assassins were at Floyd’s house about five minutes. Booth said, as they rode off: ‘I will tell you some news. I am pretty certain we have assassinated the President and Secretary Seward.’

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“About midnight on the 17th of April, 1865, the third day after the assassination, Payne, who till then had secreted himself, came disguised to Mrs. Surratt’s house and was arrested by soldiers then in possession of it. He said Mrs. Surratt had sent for him to dig a ditch.

“Mrs. Surratt, though she knew him well, denied she ever saw him. Her words were, ‘Before God, I do not know this man, and have never seen him.’

“It is not for us to pass upon the guilt of Mrs. Surratt. We would prefer to behold her pure and stainless, ‘as the angels in heaven.’

“But whomsoever indulges in wide-mouthed proclamations, or pronounces her conviction ‘an inhuman crime,’ unsupported by evidence, betrays an animus, to say the least, not overcareful of the truth. The same malevolent animus which, in defiance of all truth, calls General Hancock her murderer, also denounces him for having been a Union soldier, and not for resigning his commission, and for all the gallant service he has rendered to his country.

“‘Cease, viper: you bite a file!’”

Of General Hancock’s connection with the trial and the habeas corpus proceedings, in an interview published in the New York World, August 5, 1880, after his nomination for the presidency by the Democratic party, although I was a Republican and voted against him, I took occasion to say:

“I do not think that anybody who ever examined the case fairly could impute the least blame to General Hancock. I think from first to last he only performed what was his strict military duty.” After citing the record: “Thus you see that General Hancock fully respected the writ of habeas corpus and made a proper and respectful return to it, pleading a higher authority for not obeying it by producing the body of Mrs. Surratt. . . . Any attempt to cast blame on General Hancock for his action in connection with these events I feel confident must fail. He simply performed his duty like a good soldier.”

After the nomination of General Hancock for the presidency in 1880 by the Democratic party, at the request of the editor of the North American Review, Mr. Speed, Mr. Lincoln’s attorney-general, prepared a paper for that periodical on the trial of Mrs. Surratt. In that article, among other things, in speaking of the military commission and the fairness of her trial, he said:

“The military commission which tried the assassins of the President was carefully selected. It was composed of men taught by experience and habit to maintain coolness and equanimity in the midst of the most exciting scenes. If it was possible at that period and at that place to have secured a fair trial, the method adopted was the most certain to secure it. That commission certainly had no desire to wantonly and recklessly inflict punishment upon a woman. It patiently investigated the case. If Mrs. Surratt had not been guilty—if there had been any reasonable doubt of her guilt—she would have been acquitted, as some of the other accused persons were. The government never showed any disposition to deal severely with any of those guilty of crimes connected with the rebellion. Its military power was exercised mildly and humanely. It was only in a few instances of absolutely hideous crimes that the perpetrators suffered the extreme penalty.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

“ There is no ground for the complaint that the military court was harsh, or unjust, or cruel. There is every ground for the conclusion that it did its duty with judicial calmness and perfect conscientious impartiality. It found the proofs of guilt clear and incontestable, and rendered judgment accordingly. . . . There was an additional guarantee of fairness of the proceeding against the assassins of the President in the fact that General Hancock, a disciplined, trained and accomplished soldier, was in command at Washington at the time. His calmness and equipoise in the midst of excitement, cultivated by familiarity with scenes of carnage in the whirlwind of scores of terrific conflicts, would naturally inspire calmness in others. Had the assassins been turned over to the civil courts for trial, the result would doubtless have been the same; and in that case we would have heard a more just complaint, perhaps, that, instead of a trial by an impartial military tribunal, they were remanded to the mercies of an angry and revengeful mob of passionate civilians, from whom it was impossible to obtain a fair jury.”

This was the calm judgment upon this trial and the justice of Mrs. Surratt's conviction of one of the purest of men—one of the ablest lawyers of his time—after the thought and reflection of fifteen years.

I have given briefly the circumstances connected with the assassination and the trial of the assassins. The criticisms of those opposed to the government in relation to the trial and the execution of Mrs. Surratt, but these criticisms did not end the matter. There was attached to the record of the evidence, when it was transmitted to the office of the judge advocate general of the army, to be transmitted to the President for his approval, a recommendation to mercy signed by five of the nine members of the court. While Mr. Johnson was still President a charge had circulation through the public press that Mr. Johnson never saw this recommendation to mercy, that it had been suppressed by the judge advocate general, Judge Holt. Mr. Johnson himself never openly made the charge until after his term had expired and some time in 1873.

No graver charge could be made against a public officer than this against Judge Holt, and if true no more cruel and treacherous betrayal of a public trust was ever committed by a man in high official position. It would be murderous in intent and effect. This charge rested, so far as human testimony went, upon the solemn assertion alone of President Johnson, and if untrue, was one of the most cruel wrongs ever perpetrated by one man against another. This controversy was heated and active for many years, and in a paper read several years ago before the Commandery of the Loyal Legion of New York, I have reviewed all the testimony bearing upon the question, and given my personal connection with the affair, and I do not propose now to go into the matter. I came to the conclusion without any doubt that the charge made by Andrew Johnson was absolutely false.

The execution of the assassins was the closing scene of the greatest tragedy in our history. The assassination removed from the stage of life the greatest figure of the century.

As time goes on, his place seems to grow larger; the estimate of men higher; not only did he seem to be the special instrument raised up by Providence to save and preserve us a nation, but to strike the shackles from millions of slaves. The mighty potency and significance of his utterances and his work in preserving us a nation and making this a land of freedom each year grows in the minds of men. Not only was he this mighty leader, but he had those peculiar qualities which brought him close to the hearts of the plain people of the country. No pen can quite describe his personality. Each historian gives certain leading attributes to the man. I met him only two or three times, but was brought in close touch with all the personal anecdote and the testimony of those who were in daily intercourse with him during his presidential office. What seemed to impress those about him most was his absolute honesty, his honesty in thought, word and deed—that he was honest with every man with whom he had to deal, and honest with himself; his love of truth and his perfect confidence in the ultimate triumph of the truth, his grand simplicity of nature and speech, the great brain that seemed to grow and fit itself to all new and great occasions, to be equal to any and every emergency, and his loving, kindly nature, which seemed to draw in and hold in his heart not only his fellow countryman, but all who lived and toiled and suffered; and he had no enmity, or hatred of any human being, not even for those who were wicked or in the wrong, only a hatred of the wrong itself, and a great yearning that the erring might be brought to see the right and the truth and do the things which would make for truth and righteousness.

Of his gentleness and tenderness and kindness of heart, an instance given by his friend Speed will best illustrate. Lincoln and the other members of the bar from the capital at Springfield had been attending court at Christiansburg, and Speed was riding with them towards Springfield. He tells us that there was quite a party of these lawyers riding two by two along a country lane or road. Lincoln and John J. Harding brought up the rear of the cavalcade.

We had passed, said Speed, through a thicket of wild plum and crab-apple trees and stopped to water our horses. Harding came up alone. "Where is Lincoln?" we inquired. "Oh," replied he, "when I saw him last, he had got two young birds which the wind had blown down from their nest, and he was hunting the nest to put them back." In a short time Lincoln came up, having found the nest and placed the young birds in it. The party laughed at him, but he said, "I could not have slept if I had not restored those little birds to their mother." You will remember also his letter to the mother who had given all her sons to her country:

"I have been shown," he says, "in the files of the war department a statement that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from your grief for a loss so overwhelming, but I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation which may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and the lost, the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom."

I find nowhere a better statement descriptive of the man and of his attributes than in Choate's address upon Abraham Lincoln before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution in November, 1902. He says: "The growth and development of Lincoln's mental power and moral force, of his intense and magnetic personality, after the vast responsibilities of government were thrown upon him at the age of fifty-two, furnish a rare and striking illustration of the marvelous capacity and adaptability of the human intellect—of the sound mind in the sound body. He came to the discharge of the great duties of the presidency with absolutely no experience in the administration of government or of the vastly varied and complicated questions of foreign and domestic policy which immediately arose, and continued to press upon him during the rest of his life; but he mastered each as it came, apparently with the facility of a trained and experienced ruler. As Clarendon said of Cromwell, 'His parts seemed to be raised by the demands of great station.' His life through it all was one of intense labor, anxiety and distress, without one hour of peaceful repose from first to last. But he rose to every occasion. He led public opinion, but did not march so far in advance of it as to fail of its effective support in every great emergency. He knew the heart and thought of the people, as no man not in constant and absolute sympathy with them could have known it, and so, holding their confidence, he triumphed through and with them. Not only was there this steady growth of intellect, but the infinite delicacy of his nature and its capacity for refinement developed also, as exhibited in the purity and perfection of his language and style of speech. The rough backwoodsman, who had never seen the inside of a university, became in the end, by self-training and the exercise of his own powers of mind, heart and soul, a master of style—and some of his utterances will rank with the best, the most perfectly adapted to the occasion which produced them."

And as a terse summing up of his characteristics, the words of Emerson: "His occupying the Chair of State was a triumph of the good sense of mankind and of the public conscience. He grew according to the need; his mind mastered the problem of the day; and as the problem grew, so did his comprehension of it. In the war there was no place for holiday magistrate, nor fair weather sailor. The new pilot was hurried to the helm in a tornado. In four years—four years of battle days—his endurance, his fertility of resource, his magnanimity, were sorely tried, and never found wanting. There, by his courage, his justice, his even temper, his fertile counsel, his humanity, he stood, a heroic figure in the centre of a heroic epoch. He is the true history of the American people in his time, the true representative of this continent—father of his country, the pulse of twenty millions throbbing in his heart, the thought of their mind articulated in his tongue."

And finally may it not be said of him, "In his early days he struck roots deep down into the common soil of the earth, and in his latest years his head towered and shone among the stars."

THE STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM IN KANSAS

By GENERAL THOMAS EWING

Delivered before the Ohio Society of New York on May 9, 1892

IN February, 1854, I sat in the gallery of the senate chamber at Washington, and heard much of the debate on the bill to repeal the Missouri compromise of 1820. I was then about completing my collegiate course in Brown University, at Providence, Rhode Island. Four years before I had sat in the gallery of the old senate chamber, now the supreme court room, in company with Captain William Tecumseh Sherman (then in Washington from the Pacific coast, and about to be married), and heard that ever memorable debate which ended in the compromises of 1850, growing out of our vast accessions of territory from Mexico, and in the enactment of the cruel and barbarous fugitive slave law. I was intensely anti-slavery—far more so than my Whig training would account for. I was hot with indignation at the Whig leaders who supported the repeal of the Missouri compromise, or acquiesced in it, or resisted it but feebly. I recollect my pang of disappointment at the labored speech against the bill of Edward Everett, who was regarded as representing the conservative Whigs. It was so cool, didactic, elegant, without a glow of the indignant spirit of the North which blazed in the hearts of the people.

The gauge thrown down by the South to fight for the possession of the territories was promptly taken up; and Kansas became the battle-ground. While studying law at Cincinnati, I watched every step in the struggle—saw how the genius and energy of Eli Thayer taught the North to win Kansas for freedom by organized emigration, against the sporadic hordes from the populous borders of Missouri who poured over the line to plant slavery there. When admitted to the bar in the winter of 1856-7, I was married, and removed with my wife to Leavenworth.

On the seventh of October, 1854, Andrew H. Reeder had arrived at Fort Leavenworth—the first of the ten governors, and acting governors, Reeder, Shannon, Geary, Walker, Denver, Medary, Woodson, Stanton, Walsh and Beebe, whose brief careers form part of the tragic history of Kansas.

The pro-slavery partisans of western Missouri, as soon as the Organic Act was passed, invaded Kansas at the first election in the fall of 1854, and again at the second election in the spring of 1855; and although few of them intended to become settlers, they took possession of the polls and returned the pro-slavery candidates for the territorial legislature as having been elected. The first legislature assembled at Pawnee, near Fort Riley, July 2, 1855—very promptly ejected nine Free State men, who had been inadvertently returned as elected; enacted all the general laws of Missouri, modified so as to be applicable to Kansas; and crowned their work by enacting a complete slave code, specially invented for the occasion—requiring every territorial officer to swear to support the fugitive slave law; making it a felony, punishable with two years' imprisonment, to write or say that slavery did not legally exist in Kansas; a felony, punishable with five years' imprisonment, to bring into the territory or circulate any printed matter calculated to create dissatisfaction among slaves; and finally, making it a felony, punishable with death, to interfere knowingly, in any manner, with the tenure of slave property.

The Free State men, outraged by the forcible seizure of the territorial government by mere invaders, and by the atrocious character of the laws enacted, peremptorily and unanimously repudiated this government as a lawless usurpation. They held a delegate convention at Topeka, September 19, 1855, and there provided for the election of members of a convention to form a State constitution and apply for admission into the Union. The delegates so elected assembled at Topeka, October 23, 1855, and sat until November 11th. They formed the Topeka constitution, which was ratified by an almost unanimous vote of the Free State men of Kansas, and was by petition duly laid before Congress. A bill was passed by the United States house of representatives, July 3, 1856, admitting Kansas into the Union under this constitution, but it was defeated in the senate, and no further action was taken on it in Congress. This constitution, however, and the state officers and legislature elected under it, formed the nucleus and rallying ground for the Free State party, as against the usurped Lecompton territorial government, until the election in October, 1857, when the overwhelming numbers of the Free State men enabled them to elect a large majority of the legislature under the Lecompton territorial government, which thereupon became universally recognized as the law-making power of the people. The Topeka form of state government then quietly passed out of even nominal existence.

Prior to this, on the nineteenth of February, 1856, the pro-slavery territorial legislature had enacted a law providing for the election of a state convention, which assembled on the seventh day of September, 1857, and formed what was known as the Lecompton state constitution. This was submitted to the people for adoption or rejection at an election held December 21, 1857. There was a large majority of qualified voters ready and anxious to vote it down. That would have ended slavery in Kansas forever. But the convention had arranged an ingenious and rascally scheme for submission of the constitution in such a manner that a majority could not vote it down. Part of the tickets were printed, "For the Constitution, with Slavery," the other part, "For the Constitution, without Slavery." No other votes could be given or counted. All the votes cast were for the adoption of the constitution; and even if the constitution should be adopted without slavery, the slaves then in the territory, and their children, were to remain slaves for life.

As the time approached for this election a Free State delegate convention was called and held at Lawrence, December 2, 1857, "to take into consideration the present political situation of the territory." It resolved unanimously that everything connected with the Lecompton constitution was a swindle, and that the people could gain nothing by participating in the election on the adoption of the constitution. So that election went by default in favor of the pro-slavery party. The votes stood, for the constitution, with slavery, 6,143 (a large part of which votes were fraudulent), and for the constitution, without slavery, 569. Three thousand and twelve of this vote were returned from three precincts—Oxford, Shawnee and Kickapoo—which everybody knew had not combined a voting population of three hundred—the two precincts first mentioned being in the Shawnee Reserve, where there were no white men legally settled.

Then came the election for state officers and legislature under the Lecompton constitution, which had been fixed in the schedule of that instrument to be held on the 4th of January, 1858. The convention of the Free State party, held on the 2d of December, was re-convened, to assemble in the Congregational church at West Lawrence on the 23d of December, to settle the question whether the Free State party should or should not go into the election of officers under the Lecompton constitution, and elect, as they could easily do, Free State executive officers and a Free State legislature.

This was the final crisis in the struggle for freedom in Kansas. If the Free State men should elect a majority of the state and local officers and of the legislature, under the Lecompton constitution, we would thereby kill that attempted usurpation in Congress, because the South could gain nothing by admitting the state into the Union, with the certainty that the constitution would be immediately amended, prohibiting slavery utterly and forever. While, if the Free State men should refuse to vote, the pro-slavery men would control all departments of the proposed state government, and the state would, in all probability, be admitted under the Lecompton constitution.

The expediency of our electing officers under the Lecompton constitution was obvious to a large majority of the Free State men of Kansas, and was well supported by The Herald of Freedom, the Leavenworth Times, and other influential newspapers of our party. That policy was also urged on us by many influential friends of free state in and out of Congress—by my father, the Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, who wrote my elder brother, Hugh Ewing, then in partnership with me in the practice of law at Leavenworth, most strongly insisting that the Free State men in Kansas, who were known to have a large majority in the territory, should elect the state officers and members of the legislature under the Lecompton constitution, and thus take possession of the government and control it, so as to make Kansas a free state—just as in the then recent October election the Free State men chose the legislature and took possession of the territorial government. The Hon. Salmon P. Chase, then governor of Ohio, wrote an urgent letter to Governor Robinson, advising the voting policy, which, as well as the letter from my father, was read to the convention with great effect. The Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, an eminent member of the house of representatives from Ohio, wrote a similar letter to me, which I read to the convention, in which he said that if the Free State men should stubbornly and fanatically refuse to adopt this policy, he for one would abandon the struggle in Congress in our behalf.

But that was the path leading to a peaceful solution of the Kansas strife, and many of the most active Free State leaders in Kansas did not want to tread it. They hoped for armed collisions between the Free State men and the general government, expecting that all of the states would become involved, and that although the North would be in rebellion, and the South would have the prestige and power of the legitimate government, the superior numbers and resources of the North would certainly triumph. John Brown, of Osawotomie, was the inspirer, though not the active leader, of this radical wing of the Free State party. He regarded slavery as a crime, to be expiated in blood, and himself as a chosen instrument of its expiation—"the sword of the Lord, and of Gideon." His oft-repeated maxim was, "Without blood there can be no remission." His dream was of the abolition of slavery by northern bayonets, aided by the torch of the slave. He never doubted that the blacks would rise en masse, as soon as the North should be in the field to support them. He and his influential followers, mostly correspondents of eastern papers, were, therefore, determined to defeat the proposition to vote for officers under the Lecompton constitution, and were active and enthusiastic in securing control of the convention, held on the 23d of December, 1857.

Charles Robinson, who had been chosen governor under the Topeka constitution—a man of great ability, earnestness and honesty of purpose—presided at this convention and strongly urged the adoption of the voting policy. Most of the recognized leaders of the Free State party supported it—George W. Brown (now of Rockford, Ill.); S. N. Wood, P. C. Schuyler, M. F. Conway, J. P. Root, Robert Morrow, James Davis, S. C. Pomeroy, myself, and others, spoke for that policy. Gen. James H. Lane, who was by many regarded as pre-eminently the leader of the Free State party, was absent—non-committal—crafty-sick.

For several days preceding the assembling of the convention, it was rumored through the territory that the United States marshal at Fort Scott held a writ, issued out of the District Court there, commanding him to arrest James Montgomery, one of the radical Free State leaders, on an indictment for treason, and that the marshal had been furnished with a posse of two companies of federal infantry to enforce obedience to the writ, and was about to set out for Sugar Mound, in Linn county, where Montgomery lived and where several hundred Free State men had assembled to resist and prevent his arrest by force of arms.

The debate in the convention, on the proposition to take part in the election, was protracted throughout the first day, and was very acrimonious and exciting. On the second day, December 24th, the debate went on, and the friends of the voting policy had almost silenced opposition, when "General" E. B. Whitman, one of General Lane's political lieutenants, rode up to the church where the convention was being held, and, dismounting from "his steed of foam," strode into the convention and onto the platform, booted and spurred, "stained with the variation of each soil" 'twixt Sugar Mound and Lawrence, and in a passionate speech declared that he had just ridden eighty miles, from Sugar Mound, without stopping for food or sleep, to call the people of Kansas to arms; that General Lane was in command there, and a desperate battle was impending with the federal troops. The excitement that followed this announcement was furious and indescribable. I sprang on a table and bitterly denounced the statement as an obvious trick and fraud to control the convention. But the vote was forced at once, and the voting policy was rejected—ayes, sixty-four; noes, seventy-four. The vote was taken by representative districts and proxies were received; but the vote of persons actually present stood sixty-four for the voting policy to sixty-five against it. In the excitement and confusion which followed, the convention adjourned sine die.

While the assemblage was breaking up I called several friends to accompany me, and hastening to W. Y. Roberts, vice-president of the convention and a strong supporter of the voting policy, we persuaded him to announce to the dispersing crowd that the friends of that policy who were willing to bolt the action of the convention would meet at Masonic Hall, on Massachusetts street, at seven o'clock that evening, to nominate a state ticket and organize the territory for the election. The announcement was received with violent denunciations and yells of dissent. The bolters' meeting, when convened that evening, was broken up by a mob, who put out the lights and forcibly ejected all the bolting delegates from the hall. We re-convened, on the invitation of George W. Brown, in the basement of his Herald of Freedom printing-office. Only thirteen bolting delegates appeared, out of sixty-four; who in the convention supported the voting policy to the last. A Free State ticket was nominated, as follows: for governor, George W. Smith; lieutenant-governor, W. Y. Roberts; secretary of state, P. C. Schuyler; state treasurer, A. J. Meade (now a resident of New York city); state auditor, Joel K. Goodin; representative in Congress, Marcus J. Parrott, who was then delegate in Congress from the territory—all tried and true Free State men; all pledged, if they should be elected and the state admitted under the Le-compton constitution, to favor an immediate call of a convention, to wipe out every vestige of that odious constitution, and to frame and adopt a new one—a pledge which was exacted from every Free State candidate, big and little, nominated in the bolting movement.

The next day—Christmas—a large edition of The Herald of Freedom was gotten out by George W. Brown, its editor and proprietor—to whose pen and purse, zeal and sense, the Free State cause, from beginning to end of the struggle, was greatly indebted for its triumphs. It was filled with arguments and information in favor of our movement, and with tickets for the Free State candidates. I hired every livery stable horse and rider that could be hired in Lawrence, and had many volunteers, who carried The Herald of Freedom post-haste to every considerable settlement in the territory. It will be considered, I hope, only a pardonable vanity in me to say that I personally expended in the movement over a thousand dollars—being all the money I had or could borrow. We had but nine days in which to organize and conduct the campaign, over a settled territory two hundred miles square, without a railroad.

The pro-slavery men and newspapers fought us fiercely. Fully half of the Free State newspapers supported our movement, but the other half bitterly opposed and ridiculed it, calling our voters' assemblage "Brown's cellar-kitchen convention," and calling us all "disappointed, ambitious kickers" and "soreheads." S. N. Wood, of Council Grove, who had been appointed chairman of the executive committee by the bolters' convention, did great work in organizing and conducting the campaign. Never was there a nine days' canvass conducted over a greater area, under greater difficulties, or more vigorously. The result was watched in Washington and throughout Kansas with breathless interest, as likely to settle forever the vexed Kansas question one way or the other.

At Leavenworth, a town of perhaps four thousand people, the largest in the territory, the election was regular and the vote full, free and fair on both sides. At Mound City, in Linn county, Montgomery seized and destroyed the ballot-box and broke up the election when about half the votes had been cast. At Sugar Mound, also, the ballot-box was destroyed and the ballots scattered to the winds by a party of Free State men who were hostile to the voting policy; and so, also, at Clinton. In Wabaunsee county it was the boast of some of the extreme Free State men that the feeling was too intense there to suffer an election for officers under the Lecompton constitution to be held in any precinct in that county. The night before the election I organized a company of about thirty armed Free State men under Captain Losee, and towards morning went with them to Kickapoo, a pro-slavery village numbering a few hundred people, eight miles above Leavenworth and directly across the Missouri River from Weston, Missouri, a large town which had contracted the habit of sending its men at every election to swell the pro-slavery vote in Kickapoo. We rode into Kickapoo at daybreak, and had tied our horses and taken position near the polling place before the voting commenced, intending to see who voted and how many. Our appearance caused great excitement, and threats of violence especially among the Missourians, who came from Weston as fast as the one ferry-boat could bring them. By ten o'clock we were so overwhelmingly outnumbered that all of our troop had been induced to return to Leavenworth, except only the venerable John C. Vaughan, Wolff, Currier and myself. We four gave our pistols to our retiring comrades, as more likely to provoke attack on us than to be useful in defence against such numbers. We then took position near the polling window in a corner made by a projection of the building, where we might be crushed, but from which we could hardly be ejected, and there we stood all day. The voters, generally, made headquarters in several saloons, from which they poured out from time to time, noisy, drunk, armed with two revolvers to the voter—each man voting several times; several gangs voting as often as six times—threatening us with death if we did not leave for Leavenworth. A friend of mine named Spivey, who was a clerk for General Whitfield, in the Kickapoo land office, and who was a sober and sensible man, acted as an intermediary between the mob and us, warning us most solemnly to leave for Leavenworth, or we would be murdered. I told Spivey, and had him tell the mob, that we would not leave until the polls should close, and that they would not dare to fire on us, because they knew that if they should kill one of us, the Free State people of Leavenworth would burn both Kickapoo and Weston to the subsoil before morning. Just before the polls closed, to mark the end, Mr. Currier and I voted—as we had a right to do, being citizens of that county. Our votes were numbered 550 and 551. Only two votes were cast after we voted, when the polls were closed the total vote being 553. Whereupon, about dark, after having submitted to a good deal of hustling and rough handling, we rode off for Leavenworth in a shower of rotten eggs and pistol shots.

The returns of the election, as provided in the schedule of the constitution, were sent to John Calhoun, at Lecompton, who was surveyor-general of Kansas, and president of the convention. He made and published his official statement of the result in each county, showing the election of the entire pro-slavery state ticket, and a pro-slavery majority in both branches of the legislature. His decision was prima facie correct, and beyond review or reversal by any territorial authority. Calhoun forthwith left for Washington to report the result to Buchanan's administration, that it might be officially laid before Congress.

Immediately on this announcement, and solely on my own impulse and initiative, I went to the territorial legislature, which had assembled at Lawrence in regular session, January 4, 1858, and was controlled by the Free State party, and there procured the passage of a law, approved January 14, 1858, creating a board to investigate and report upon the frauds committed at the election on the adoption of the constitution, December 21, 1857; and also at the election for officers under the constitution, January 4, 1858, and in the returns thereof. Henry J. Adams, J. B. Abbott, Dillon Peckering, E. L. Taylor, H. T. Green, and myself, composed the board. L. A. McLean, who was Surveyor-General Calhoun's chief clerk, was summoned to appear before us as a witness, together with the other pro-slavery men employed in the office of the surveyor-general at Lecompton, where the election returns and all the archives relating to the Lecompton constitution had been filed. McLean appeared and swore that Calhoun had taken all the returns relating to the elections under the Lecompton constitution with him to Washington. This struck us as a very improbable story; but McLean stuck to it with a respectfulness, dignity and sincerity of manner which was very impressive. No one could be found to throw a doubt on his statement. We had the surveyor-general's office at Lecompton searched for the returns by our sergeant-at-arms, but not a scrap of them was found. Our investigation, obviously, could amount to nothing without these returns; so, with Calhoun in Washington, and his subordinates swearing that he took the returns with him, we felt utterly baffled and beaten.

At a late hour of the second night after McLean's testimony was given, as I was returning to my room at the Eldridge House, I was accosted in the dark, on a lonely street, by a man whom I did not know, who asked my name, but refused to give his own. He handed me his revolver as an assurance of his pacific intentions, saying that he had been watching on the street for me for several hours. He said he had heard a report of McLean's testimony before our board, and desired to know if it was given as stated. I replied that it was. He said it was a lie and he could prove it, if it would do any good. He said, however, that he lived at Lecompton, and would in all probability be murdered if he should be known to have informed on McLean and his associates. I satisfied him that if he could and would give me information exposing the falsity of McLean's testimony, his action should not be known, and that with that information we could drive Calhoun and his gang from the territory and defeat the Lecompton constitution.

He then said that late in the night preceding the day when McLean appeared as a witness before our board, he (McLean) had buried a large candle-box under a woodpile adjoining his office and that he had been seen by Charley Torrey, the janitor, who slept in the building and who told my informant. He then gave me his name as Henry W. Petrikin, and described himself as being a clerk in the office of William Brindle, receiver of the United States land office at Lecompton. This was a voucher for his good faith, for I knew enough of General Brindle to know that he would have no rascals about him.

Next day, aided by my official position as one of the commissioners to investigate the election frauds, I obtained from Josiah Miller, probate judge of Douglas county (now deceased), a search warrant directed to Captain Samuel Walker, sheriff of Douglas county (who had already done loyal service to the Free State cause and was eager to do more), commanding him to enter upon and search the premises of the surveyor-general, in Lecompton, and (if practicable) to find, take and bring before Judge Miller all the original returns of elections on or under the Lecompton constitution. Enjoining Judge Miller to secrecy, I then sought Sheriff Walker and requested him to pick out a dozen fighting men well armed, to go with him as a posse, and told him I had a writ for him to execute, and would tell him at daybreak next morning where to go and what to do. Captain Walker was on hand punctually, with his trusty squad in a back alley; and after receiving the warrant and full instructions from me, he set out unobserved from Lawrence for Lecompton, eight miles away. He pounced upon the surveyor-general's premises early in the morning, dug up a buried candle-box from under a great woodpile adjoining the office, and before noon he rode up Massachusetts street, in Lawrence, at the head of his squad, holding the candle-box on the pommel of his saddle.

C. W. Babcock, president of the council; G. W. Dietzler, speaker of the house of representatives; and J. W. Denver, acting governor, met the investigating board in the office of Judge Miller. Sheriff Walker made return of his search warrant and delivered the candle-box to Judge Miller, who opened and produced from it all the returns of the election for officers of the Lecompton constitution, which McLean had sworn had been taken by Calhoun to Washington. The Kickapoo returns had swollen to 995, from 553, which was the actual vote (chiefly fraudulent) when the polls closed, there being 442 names added to the list of voters after the names of Currier and Ewing, and after the polls closed. Oxford, which had a legitimate vote of about one hundred, had the number increased in the returns, through obvious forgery, to 1,266; the returns from Shawnee showed about fifty real voters, to which had been added names—fictitious names, bringing the total up to 729. The fraudulent additions were as apparent on the face of the returns as would be extensions of the legs in a boy's trousers. They were all on the pro-slavery side; but proving insufficient to effect the desired result, a return from Delaware Crossing, in Leavenworth county, which had been honestly made by the two judges of election, was forged, by splicing with a sheet containing 336 additional names of pro-slavery voters in a different handwriting and in different ink—these fraudulent votes electing the whole legislative ticket of eleven members from Leavenworth county, and giving both branches of the legislature to the pro-slavery party.

These entire returns showed 6,875 votes cast for Free State candidates, and, counting in all the returns, valid and fraudulent, a few hundred more for pro-slavery candidates. On the same day, the 4th of January, 1858, an election was held under a statute then recently passed by the Free State legislature, to take a vote on the adoption or rejection of the Lecompton constitution, at which 10,226 votes were cast against it and none in its favor. This last-named vote shows the whole strength of the Free State party of Kansas, while the vote of 6,875 for Free State candidates under the Lecompton constitution, shows that 3,351 Free State men who voted against the Lecompton constitution did not vote for officers under it. In other words, the Free State men who opposed the voting policy were thus shown to comprise only one-third of the Free State party.

Immediately on this exposure (January 28, 1858), I swore out a warrant for the arrest of McLean for perjury. But as soon as the candle-box had been dug up from the woodpile, he had fled with his fellow-conspirators, never to return to Kansas. I met McLean six years later, when I was in command of our troops at Fort Davidson, adjacent to Pilot Knob, Missouri, ninety miles below St. Louis. He was then chief of staff of General Sterling Price, who was marching on St. Louis at the head of an army of twenty-two thousand men. McLean came to me under a flag of truce, demanding the surrender to Price of the little fort and its garrison of 1,060 men, together with its enormous accumulation of quartermaster, commissary and ordnance stores, which were greatly needed by the rebel army. The demand being refused, Price stormed the fort, but was repulsed with great slaughter.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

It is but just to McLean to say that I have a letter from Ely Moore, of Lawrence, dated March 1, 1894, which says that he was living at Lecompton on the 25th of January, 1858, when the candle-box containing the returns was buried under the woodpile, and that it was done by another person, whom he names, without McLean's presence or knowledge. And further, that McLean really believed, when he testified before the board, that the returns had been taken by Calhoun to Washington. He says McLean fled the night following the unearthing of the candle-box, because appearances indicated that he had committed perjury, though, in fact, he was innocent of the crime.

The exposure of the frauds struck the Lecomptonites dumb. Every incident was telegraphed and published everywhere. On the day of the exposure, Henry W. Petrikin, who is now living at Montoursville, Pennsylvania, got a brief statement of the facts signed by the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature, and by Acting-Governor Denver, which statement he carried post-haste to Washington and laid before President Buchanan in presence of Senator Bigler, of Pennsylvania; Senator Dickinson, of New York; General Sam Houston, of Texas; Hon. Allison White, of Pennsylvania; and R. Bruce Petrikin, of Pennsylvania. I followed in a day or two with the report of our board to investigate the election frauds, accompanied by an abstract of the candle-box returns, and a memorial to Congress, all of which I caused to be printed at once and laid on the desk of each member of Congress.

Thereupon, the bill then pending in Congress for the admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, dropped dead. A few months afterwards the English bill was forced through Congress by the administration. It provided for the submission of the Lecompton constitution to a free vote of the people of Kansas, and offered them five and a half millions of acres of the public lands for common schools and a university, and five per cent. of all the public lands in the territory (being about two and a half millions of acres more) for internal improvements—all the grants being conditioned on the acceptance of that constitution by the people. The offer and the constitution were contemptuously rejected on the 2d of August, 1858, by a vote of 11,300 against the proposition, to 1,788 in its favor. Thereupon, the Lecompton constitution was abandoned, and Kansas was kept out of the Union for more than two years longer to do penance for its devotion to freedom.

The waves which rolled high in Kansas during the political storm of 1855-6-7 extended throughout the Northern states and were long in subsiding. As late as the fall of 1860, the Kansas questions were uppermost for political discussion in every Northern state. On my way through Cincinnati to Lancaster, Ohio, during the political campaign in October, 1859, I was taken to make a speech at a Republican meeting in Fifth street, Market space, then being addressed by Tom Corwin and Caleb B. Smith. When I reached the stand, Corwin was speaking. He had been discussing only Kansas questions. As I ascended the steps he turned and greeted me with some pleasant words of recognition, and then branched off on Kansas politics, appealing to me as a witness and a participant. He told with mock gravity of our many governments there; spoke of the Lecompton territorial government, the Topeka provisional government, the Lecompton state government, the Topeka state government, and the Leavenworth state government, and described them all as being in full operation, electing state, territorial, county, township, and city officers under each government, and all in full operation at the same time. He said it brought on a general election every month, and a county, city or township election every other day. He said: "My fellow citizens: Kind and benignant nature always responds to wants and habits of men; and I now make the prediction that the next generation in Kansas will be born with ballot-boxes in their bellies, like 'possums; so they can vote whenever they want to!"

Thirty-six years have passed since the Free State struggle in Kansas ended. I have never, until recently, told all of this story to any but my own family. In making it public now, I wish not to seem unmindful of the heroism of the Free State men in the earlier phases of the contest, when many suffered capture, imprisonment and death in the cause; nor of the wisdom and forbearance of Governor Robinson and his associates, and the patriotic resistance to party dictation of Governors Walker, Stanton and Denver, which contributed so much to the happy solution of the controversy. I have written only of the last phase of that protracted struggle, which ended in February, 1858, in the abandonment of all attempt to force slavery on Kansas.

Those brilliant, patriotic and enthusiastic young men of the press—William A. Phillips, lately deceased, who crowned his glorious services for freedom in Kansas, with a service equally glorious in the army; James Redpath, Richard J. Hinton, and their associates, Kege, Realf, Cook, Tappan, Walden and others, whose political letters filled all the Republican papers of that day with reports of the struggle for freedom in Kansas—were imbued with John Brown's fervid faith that slavery would be abolished through a war of the North against the South, brought on by collisions in Kansas between the Free State party and the federal government. In their correspondence with the Republican newspapers, they wrought up and magnified the incidents of the Kansas struggle in 1855-6-7, when it was a struggle of force and blood; but they were not friendly to the efforts by which the Lecompton constitution was at last peacefully defeated. Hence the final and decisive movements which I have here narrated were ignored or underestimated in the contemporary press, and have been almost overlooked in nearly all the histories of the Kansas struggle.

The importance of that struggle cannot be overestimated. It was the prelude to the war of the rebellion, and prepared the people to realize its magnitude and to resolve that it should be a fight to the finish. But for this long preparation, it is not improbable that the rebellion would have ended in a compromise, leaving slavery, though crippled, a lasting cause of bad blood and strife between the sections. Had John Brown's purpose to bring on a war between the sections succeeded, with the South in possession of all the power and prestige of the general government, and the North in rebellion, all the nations of the world would have stood by the South and the general government; while the North would have been divided, overwhelmed and conquered. But there was a higher power which foiled John Brown's mad scheme. The great sweep of events, from the Kansas-Nebraska bill to the surrender at Appomattox, was no doubt divinely directed to unify and purify our people for their glorious mission. Whoever bore an honorable part, however humble, on the Northern side in the great struggle, has reason to thank God for having made him an instrument in preserving this beneficent republic, which is the hope and light of the world.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

By DAVID HOMER BATES

Cipher Operator in the War Department Telegraph Office During the Civil War, 1861-1865

Read before the Ohio Society of New York on the evening of February 10, 1900

LINCOLN, "That kindly, earnest, brave, fore-seeing man; patient, sagacious, dreading praise not blame."

This tribute from James Russell Lowell's "Commemoration Ode," uttered at Harvard forty-five years ago, less than three months after Lincoln's tragic death, when his fame had only just begun to take on its brilliancy, is still, after the lapse of all these years, a true estimate of his character. It well expresses the judgment formed by me from daily intercourse with him in the War Department telegraph office, during four long years of the Civil War, confirmed by careful study since his death of his life and writings.

To those of my hearers who may have read my paper on Lincoln in the symposium published in the New York Independent, April 4, 1895, I owe an apology for now repeating some of the matter contained in that article, but as partial compensation I will add a few bona fide stories which I can testify are authentic. I was a mere youth when I first met Lincoln, in April, 1861, only about ten days after Sumter's fateful signal to the world. Simon Cameron, secretary of war, had appointed Colonel Thomas A. Scott general manager of military railroads and telegraphs, and one of his first acts was to telegraph to Andrew Carnegie, then superintendent of the Pittsburg division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, asking him to send expert telegraph operators to Washington at once. Mr. Carnegie selected four, and accordingly about April 20, 1861, or a few days thereafter, David Strouse, Richard O'Brien, Samuel M. Brown and David Homer Bates started for Washington, via Philadelphia and Perryville. Arriving at the Susquehanna River, opposite Havre de Grace, we learned that a band of rebels from Baltimore, evidently encouraged by the disloyal sentiments of the mayor and other leading citizens, had destroyed the railroad bridges over the Gunpowder and Bush rivers, and we were, therefore, compelled to go by water to Annapolis. The celebrated Seventh New York, under Col. Marshall Lefferts, had gone forward to Annapolis a few days before, and the old steamer "Maryland," on which they sailed, had just returned. Old-timers will remember this historic vessel, which was used by the P. W. & B. Railroad Company for transferring cars across the Susquehanna River to and from Havre de Grace, and which after the war was burned and then rebuilt, and under the same name, "Maryland," is still in daily use between Jersey City and Mott Haven.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

On that April night, thirty-nine years ago, our little band of telegraphers, the nucleus of the United States military telegraph corps, which during the war rendered such confidential and important service to the government, embarked on the old "Maryland" in company with a body of federal troops, among whose officers was Ormsby M. Mitchel, celebrated astronomer and soldier. We were compelled to pass the eventful night without any home comforts. I clearly remember that we were very hungry and that we could only find rest and occasional sleep on top of bags of coffee that were being taken to Annapolis for our troops. Arriving there next morning, the four young operators reported to Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, who had just established his headquarters at the Naval Academy after his exciting march through Baltimore, where our troops were attacked by the mob of rebel sympathizers, and where the first blood was shed in the Civil War. Little did we think, that bright spring morning, as we landed on the banks of the beautiful Severn and walked across the lovely grounds of the Naval Academy, that the greatest war of the century, in the number of men engaged, the enormous loss of life and the vital problems solved, was just begun. I had never before seen a slave, and when the colored men took off their hats and bowed and the women curtsied, it seemed we were in a strange land, everything was so new and different, and besides we were sleepy, tired and hungry.

We called on General Butler and next day went to Washington by rail and there reported at the War Department for orders. The secretary's office was in the southeast room on the second floor of that old historic building, since demolished. The telegraph instruments were in the adjoining room, and as we were ushered in we saw Mr. Lincoln with Secretary Cameron, Gen. Winfield Scott and one or two others. Lincoln was six feet four inches. Cameron was by no means small of stature, while General Scott was massive as well as tall. At the moment the commanding general was the chief object of our curiosity, although the kindly face of Mr. Lincoln was singularly attractive.

It was my lot during the succeeding four years, until the very night of his taking off by the bullet of Booth, to see Mr. Lincoln almost every day and generally several times a day, as he visited the War Department telegraph office about nine o'clock every morning, and again in the afternoon, and almost invariably in the evening in order that he might receive the latest news from the various military headquarters in the field, and at the same time keep in touch with the secretary of war and the commander-in-chief; it followed, therefore, that he made the telegraph office a sort of rendezvous, sitting always, or generally, at one particular desk, that of Major Eckert, the military superintendent of telegraph, for whom both Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Stanton had a very high personal regard. Conferences would be had almost daily between the President, Secretary Stanton and other members of his cabinet, or their assistants, and with General Halleck, and afterwards General Grant and other prominent generals, and many of these conferences were held in the telegraph room. I was too young at the time to fully appreciate and avail of the opportunity thus thrown in my way, but as time passes my mind reverts to many of these interviews at which, in the performance of my official duties, I was necessarily present, and when grave problems of the war were discussed by Mr. Lincoln and his cabinet or military officers.

On one occasion an official letter was received by me from the operator at Wilmington, Del., on the route of the Washington-Fortress Monroe military line. The operator's name was John Wintrup, who for many years past has been in the employ of the American Steamship Line in Philadelphia. Mr. Wintrup's signature was written in a large, bold hand, with the final letter of his name quite large, and ending with a series of flourishes which tended to obscure the name. Mr. Lincoln, seeing the letter on my table, and noting the peculiar signature, remarked that "it reminded him of a short-legged man wearing a long-tailed overcoat, which, as the man walked through the snow wiped out the tracks made by his feet."

Many of Mr. Lincoln's stories were in couples, like man and wife, one corresponding to the other. For instance, most of you will recall Tom Hood's spoiled child, which, as I remember it, was represented by a series of pictures.

First, the nurse placing the baby in the arm chair before a grate fire and covering it over with a shawl to shield it from the heat. The next scene shows the fat aunt coming into the room and, being near sighted, she flops down into the comfortable looking chair, and of course there is a rumpus and scream, and the next scene shows the nurse entering the room, rescuing the child from beneath the heavy weight, and, as she holds it in her arms in front of her, the next scene shows the mother and father coming into the room, and the baby is smashed so flat that the parents cannot see it. A reference being made to this spoiled child story of Mr. Hood's, Mr. Lincoln thereupon produced its companion as follows:

Scene, a theatre. Curtain just going up. Enter a man with a high hat, who becomes so interested in what is transpiring on the stage that involuntarily he places his hat upside down on the adjoining seat, without observing the approach of a fat dowager who, being nearsighted, like the aunt of the spoiled child, does not observe the open door of the hat. She sits down and, of course, there is a crunching noise, and the owner of the hat, too late to rescue it, reaches out to take hold of it just as the fat woman arises, and holding the hat in front of him says to the lady, "Madam, I knew that hat would not fit you when I saw you try it on."

While all of Mr. Lincoln's stories were illustrative of some argument or point he wished to make, some of them, I regret to say, were off color, and to this date it has been a matter of sincere regret that I listened to any of that character. Marc Antony, in his address over the dead body of Cæsar, says that "The evil that men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with their bones." So in this case, without detracting one iota from Mr. Lincoln's greatness or goodness, still the one thread of error in his character, as I saw it, was in that direction. There were some stories of his which, while not really bad, yet were suitable only for home consumption, and not for a general assembly of saints.

In the spring of 1862, General Schenck, afterwards minister to England, and perhaps more renowned as the author of a popular treatise on "The Art of Playing Poker," was in command of our troops near Alexandria, Va., and for weeks there had been almost daily skirmishes between the pickets or small detachments from the two armies, but no considerable fighting, and there had been numerous complaints in the daily press that some definite movement was not made. Finally, a larger detachment than usual was sent out by General Schenck and they succeeded in capturing twenty or thirty rebel prisoners, each of whom, as the telegram reported, had a "Colt's" revolver, and the president, upon glancing at the dispatch, remarked that we would soon have an evidence of the great faculty possessed by newspaper correspondents to enlarge upon facts, because, he said, no doubt by the time tomorrow's papers are printed these Colt's revolvers will all have grown into horse-pistols.

He then went on to speak of the dilly-dallying of the two armies and said it put him in mind of two dogs barking and snapping at each other on opposite sides of a rail fence, along which they both ran until finally coming to an opening they pricked up their ears, ceased barking, and then turning tail trotted off as if they had no further interest in the promised fight.

One day in the early part of the war Mr. Lincoln brought to the telegraph office a photograph that some army surgeon had forwarded to him in connection with his application for promotion or transfer. This photograph represented a man of the type of the Boer General Joubert, with exceptionally long hair and whiskers, the latter reaching nearly to the bottom of the picture, which showed only the bust down to the waist. Mr. Lincoln remarked that he was glad to receive that picture, and if now he could only get two long-haired persons of that sort, one a male and the other a female, he would take measures to preserve them and raise them for their hair.

Apropos of this whisker story, Mr. John H. Littlefield, in an address at the Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, only two weeks ago, narrated some of his personal recollections of Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Littlefield studied law under Mr. Lincoln, and at one time practised in his office. He told of a letter which Mr. Lincoln received in the summer of 1864, before his re-election, from a young woman in Buffalo, in which she said:

"If you will allow your whiskers to grow I think I can get three votes for you, those of my father and two brothers. They say they will never vote for such a homely man as you are without your whiskers."

Once, not more than sixty days before his death, he came into the telegraph office with a photograph of himself, which had been addressed to his wife and sent through the mail. The sender had added to the picture a rope, which passed around the neck and then upward, tautly drawn, as indicating his hellish desire. Mr. Lincoln remarked that it had caused Mrs.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Lincoln some anxiety, which he did not share, although he added some words of sorrow that any human being could be so devoid of feeling as to thus wound an innocent woman. As for himself, he said that he had received many similar missives and had come to look upon them with nothing more than a passing thought.

The crystallized opinion of the generation since Lincoln's tragic death is that his state papers as well as the many letters written by him, and the speeches he made during his political career, are models of clear, undefiled English, and that some of them, notably his short Gettysburg address, are classics, to which the present and coming generations may turn for inspiration of liberty loving patriotism and for an education in the best forms of expression of great thoughts. But back of all this beauty of form and irresistible force of argument inherent in the body of his utterances, whether spoken or written, there was something more. There was the spirit of a great man, the throb of a human heart that first of all loved all other hearts and, loving, sought to do them good, and never did he allow force of logic or attractiveness of diction, either in choice of words or manner of expression, to obscure this one great thought and purpose.

It is well known that there were many sides to Lincoln's character. I do not venture to speak of him as a story teller pure and simple, a politician, or leader of men, a statesman, or even a writer of the best English, and he was all these and, in the best sense, notably so, but I will refer briefly to that personal trait of his which always impressed me more forcibly than any other feature of his character, namely, the evident kindly disposition always present with him towards his opponents and the nation's enemies.

In his second inaugural address, March 4, 1865, he used two short expressions, which so well illustrate his trust in God and his love for man that I quote them to point my meaning. One of these is from the Holy Writ, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether." The other expression he used is his own wording of Christ's love for humanity, "With malice toward none and charity for all." If love be the fulfilling of that divine law, then, in my opinion, Abraham Lincoln was the nearly perfect example of his generation.

I do not refer specially to his belief in a Divine Being, nor in the Christian faith, although his manifold utterances on the subject of slavery and the many quotations from the Bible in his state papers and messages to Congress shall ever proclaim to the thinking world that at the very root of his spiritual nature he held the teachings of Christ to be sacred and worthy of acceptance, and his whole public life, as well as his words, when stripped of a certain rudeness incident to his early surroundings, exemplified those teachings. But I am now referring to that period of his later career, during which, far more than ever before, the inborn and inbred kindness of his nature was taxed to the uttermost by the treason of many of his former political acquaintances and including some he had before called personal friends, and by the perfidy and malice of the Northern Copperhead, and by the blind unreasoning impatience of a few otherwise patriotic men, prominent in the public eye, who seemed to think the Civil War should be conducted according to their own narrow and generally selfish ideas. Whatever may have been his inmost thoughts respecting his enemies and their efforts to sting and crush him, his truly noble heart in its outward expressions exhibited only love and charity for all and malice toward none. His logic was unerring, his homely illustrations effective, and his fund of good humor proverbially unailing. Never once in the four years did I ever discover in him any anger or malice, nor was he ever without a clear opinion upon any subject presented, excepting when he gave good reasons for not expressing at the time a final judgment. If others disagreed with him, he sought to convince them that they were wrong, rather than that he was right. I heard him say once that in trying cases in court he usually adopted that plan. His habit of speech was conversational and argumentative and invariably convincing. Speaking of resentment, Mr. Lincoln once said to Gustavus V. Fox, assistant secretary of the navy, who was urging Mr. Lincoln to some retaliatory action in the celebrated "Blair" controversy: "Mr. Fox, you have more of that feeling of personal resentment than I have; perhaps I have too little of it, but I never thought it paid, and a man has no time to spend half his life in quarrels. If any man ceases to attack me, I never remember the past against him."

Some of my older hearers will doubtless remember a pictorial Book of Nonsense which was popular many years ago, and which was once referred to in my presence by Mr. Lincoln in illustrating his idea that the best method of meeting or allaying anger on the part of others was to adopt a conciliatory attitude. He referred to this Book of Nonsense, which he said he had seen when a boy or young man, and he told of the picture in the book of the angry cow in the field and the maiden seated on the stile, who is made to say:

"How shall I soften the heart of this cow?
I will sit on this stile, and continue to smile,
Till I soften the heart of this cow."

After the death of Mr. Lincoln our troops captured Jefferson Davis and some members of his cabinet and one of his aides, Col. Burton N. Harrison, whose wife has made her mark in the literary world. The papers and baggage of these parties were brought to the war department, and the secretary of war detailed me to make up an inventory of these articles. In Colonel Harrison's valise was found a copy of the "Book of Nonsense." I have met Colonel Harrison frequently since, and once told him of Mr. Lincoln's reference to it, and asked him how he came to be in possession of the book. He answered that it was given to him by the captain of the government vessel which brought him from Charleston to Fortress Monroe, to help pass the time away.

The military telegrams were mostly in cipher and it was sometimes a task to decipher a difficult message, because of telegraphic errors. Mr. Lincoln's interest and anxiety at such periods were very great, especially when the dispatches referred to a battle. The late Charles A. Dana, long editor of the New York Sun, had been assigned to the duty of visiting Grant's headquarters in Mississippi, and afterwards in Tennessee, and his telegraphic reports were generally full and always of great interest. Mr. Lincoln looked forward eagerly to Mr. Dana's accounts of the various engagements with the enemy. The latter's strong, virile manner of expressing himself on important questions is well known, and as the telegrams were audibly read by Mr. Lincoln, possibly merited criticisms were softened in the reading by side remarks. It was his habit to read aloud and to bring his listeners into the current of his thoughts by question or suggestion.

In our cipher code there were several words, each translated "Jefferson Davis." Other words stood for "Robert E. Lee," and so on. Whenever Mr. Lincoln came to these words he would shorten or transform them into something else; for instance, "Jeffy D.," "Bobby Lee," etc., so that there seemed to go out from him at such times, and indeed on many other occasions, a gentle, kindly influence. He appeared to be thinking of the leaders of the rebellion as wayward sons, rather than as traitorous brethren.

Secretary Stanton in his intercourse with the public was haughty, severe, and exacting, especially in cases where he had even the smallest suspicion of the loyalty of the person with whom he was in communication. In fact, he never gave the other person the benefit of a doubt. Intensely in earnest himself, he required of everyone a like zeal and devotion, with an utter sacrifice of self interest and convenience where the government was concerned. Accordingly, Mr. Stanton was brusque, and oftentimes rude to newspaper men, members of Congress and others who applied to him for news from the front. On the other hand, Mr. Lincoln freely told what he heard in the way of early dispatches from army headquarters in the field, and there were occasions when he disclosed in advance maneuvers of special importance and in some way the rebels got wind of the movement and its object was thus defeated. It was Mr. Lincoln's custom when he came to the War Department telegraph office to read over the military telegrams that were always placed upside down in a special drawer in one of the cipher operator's desks, the latest on top. It came to pass after awhile that we were instructed by Secretary Stanton not to place in that drawer copies of dispatches referring in advance to specially important movements of the army; for instance, a battle in progress or impending, until he had first seen the dispatches, and in some cases the Secretary retained both the original and the duplicate copies. Mr. Lincoln's keenness soon led him to the discovery of the Secretary's order, and, without criticising our course in the slightest, he would sometimes ask if there were not some later news which he could get from Mr. Stanton. If there were, he would then go to the adjoining room and see the Secretary, or "Mars," as Mr. Lincoln called him.

On the afternoon of Friday, April 14, 1865, the day of his assassination, Mr. Lincoln made his accustomed call at the War Department telegraph office. He came earlier than usual, however, because, as we afterwards learned, of his expected visit in the evening to Ford's Theatre.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Although I was on duty at the time I have no distinct remembrance of the occasion, for what occurred a few hours later was so appalling that memory retained nothing clearly, except that which took place after the awful news was received. First came word that the president was shot; then, horror following fast upon horror, the savage attack upon Secretary Seward, the frustrated efforts to reach and kill Secretary Stanton, Vice-President Johnson and other members of the government, and as the successive accounts crystalized, a fearful dread filled every soul lest it should be found that the entire cabinet had been murdered. An hour or more of this awful suspense and we received a message from Major Eckert, who had gone quickly with Secretary Stanton to the house on Tenth street to which the president had been carried. This news simply assured us of the present safety of Stanton, while confirming our worst fears concerning the president.

A relay of messengers was established between Major Eckert and the War Department, and all night long they carried their portentous news in the form of bulletins, in the handwriting of Secretary Stanton, addressed to Gen. John A. Dix, commanding general, New York City, and which were distributed to the press throughout the country. As these bulletins were spelled out in the Morse telegraph characters, over the wires leading north, it seemed to us, as I remember, Albert Chandler, Charlie Tinker and myself, whose fingers manipulated the keys, that never sadder signals formed.

The awfulness of the scenes transpiring before us hushed us into silence, except for an occasional outburst of sorrow and amazement, and tears, of which none of us were ashamed, were freely shed. As the hours slowly passed, hope revived as to the president's life being spared, but at last, about 7:30 A. M. the following morning, the tension broke and we knew for a certainty that he was dead. Then we looked out upon the light of day, which before we had not observed, or at least with consciousness, and the force of the blow seemed to be increased by recalling the previous day when we had last seen the president. We thought of his daily visits, and, most of all, in the close presence of our great sorrow, did we think of his loving heart and the many evidences he had given us of the entire absence from that heart of anger or resentment towards his country's enemies.

Let me close this desultory sketch by a quotation from Mr. Lincoln's midnight speech on November 10, 1864, as he was leaving the War Department telegraph office after the welcome news had been received of his certain re-election to the presidency: "So long as I have been here I have not willingly planted a thorn in any man's bosom. While I am deeply sensible to the high compliment of re-election and duly grateful, as I trust, to Almighty God for having directed my countrymen to a right conclusion, as I think for their own good, it adds nothing to my satisfaction that any other man may be disappointed or pained by the result. May I ask those who have not differed with me to join with me in this same spirit towards those who have." Who shall say that he did not have the mind that was in Christ?

that in no case did the enemy ever succeed in deciphering our messages, let us add that neither did any federal cipher-operator ever prove recreant to his sacred trust, and we have in a sentence two facts that reflect infinite credit upon the corps."

Plum further says that "Col. Thomas A. Scott, assistant secretary of war and general manager of military railroads and telegraphs, called to his aid four operators from the Pennsylvania Railroad line. These operators reported at Washington on April 27, 1861, traveling via Philadelphia, Perryville and Annapolis. Their names were David Strouse, D. H. Bates, Samuel M. Brown and Richard O'Brien." This was the nucleus of the United States military telegraph corps, which rendered such important service to our government during the Civil War. The outlines of the history of that war were sketched by the telegraph.

Strouse was appointed superintendent, Brown was stationed at the Navy Yard, O'Brien at the Arsenal and the writer at the War Department, where he remained until after the close of the war as manager and cipher-operator, two of his associates being Mr. Charles A. Tinker and Mr. Albert B. Chandler, who have long occupied high official positions in the commercial telegraph service of the country.

Two cipher operators were required to be at their post of duty during the day time, holidays and Sundays not excepted, and, as a rule, until eleven or twelve o'clock at night.

On the fateful night of April 14, 1865, we remained all night for the purpose of transmitting Secretary Stanton's graphic bulletins to the newspapers, giving the details of Lincoln's assassination and of the scenes at his deathbed.

The federal cipher codes were very simple and yet absolutely secret, arbitrary words being used to represent proper names, and also many ordinary words and military phrases. The words of the entire body of the dispatch, after being concealed in this manner, were then arranged in one of over a thousand possible combinations, the particular combination being indicated by a key-word, and as each combination had several key-words, it was not necessary to use the same one twice in succession. As a feature of the combination blind words were interspersed at regular or varying intervals, which, in translation, were of course discarded. When finally prepared for transmission, the dispatch was wholly unintelligible to the transmitting or receiving operator, and no case is recalled of the enemy's having translated a federal cipher dispatch. On the other hand, many of the rebel cipher dispatches, which fell into our hands by capture or through our spies, were translated by our cipher operators, and thus important military information was secured by our commanding generals.

The rebels, instead of adopting a plan similar to ours, which was at once secret and speedy, made use of the crude plan of transposing the letters of the alphabet in various ways. I remember that when John Wilkes Booth was captured there was found in his vest pocket a copy of the identical alphabet square which formed the basis of many of the rebel ciphers.

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

In some cases the hieroglyphic plan was adopted by the rebels, and it was this method which was followed in the instances referred to below.

As the chief feature developed by the fortunate translation of these two ciphers was a plot for the seizure by rebel emissaries of two ocean steamers after leaving New York harbor, it is well to recall that during the latter part of 1863 there was very great excitement in the North occasioned by the activity and aggressiveness of the rebel navy, and by the fact that both England and France were allowing rebel ships to be built and equipped in those countries. The newspapers were full of accounts of damage done to our shipping by the rebels, and it was feared that by means of a sudden dash they might even capture and set fire to one of our seaport cities before suitable help could arrive. Slidell, the rebel envoy, was in Europe trying to secure recognition, and while he did not accomplish this result, he did obtain practical aid and comfort from English and French shipbuilders. Gunboats, iron-clad rams and warships had been purchased by the rebels and were already on the high seas, and others were then building in England under the quasi protection of the authorities. Years afterwards, in the Geneva award of $15,000,000, the United States received definite acknowledgment of the fact that England, in allowing the "Alabama" and other rebel war vessels to be fitted out in English shipyards, had violated our treaty rights.

The state correspondence between the United States and Great Britain, in 1863, shows how serious and critical the conditions were, for on September 4, of that year, our minister at London, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, after repeated protests addressed to the British government, received a note from Lord Russell, prime minister, stating that "Her Majesty's government are advised that they can not interfere in any way with these vessels"—referring to certain iron-clad rams already completed by the Lairds at Birkenhead, and which were about to sally forth to prey upon our commerce. Minister Adams answered Lord Russell instantly in these words: "It would be superfluous for me to point out to your lordship that this would be war."

In France the situation was equally grave, for Slidell was in close touch with the French cabinet, and especially with Emperor Napoleon, the latter having in a private interview promised that certain iron-clad rams and corvettes, which were building at Bordeaux and Nantes for the rebel navy, should be allowed to sail. The emperor also gave to the French shipbuilders like assurances.

On this side of the Atlantic the capture of the City of Mexico in June, 1863, by French troops, and the selection, in August, of Prince Maximilian, of Austria, as Emperor of Mexico, by the hastily convened assembly of notables, were events of grave importance to us, and seemed likely to have an immediate and favorable influence upon the fortunes of the confederate cause.

Secretary Seward, in September, 1863, instructed Minister Dayton to convey to the French government the views of President Lincoln, which pointed to the maintenance by the United States of the Monroe doctrine, even at the risk of ultimate war with France, if the latter persisted in imposing a monarchy upon Mexico.

In October the reply of the French government was received, to the effect that "the sooner the United States showed itself satisfied, and manifested a willingness to enter into peaceful relations with the new government in Mexico, the sooner would France be ready to leave," etc.

This disturbance of our foreign relations was creating intense anxiety in the North, and the public mind was further roused by various movements of rebel vessels, including freebooters and pirates, as well as those acting under regular commission.

For instance, in September, 1863, a plot was laid by the rebels to seize the steamer "Michigan" on Lake Erie, and to make use of her to liberate several thousand rebel prisoners near Sandusky. Fortunately, this failed in execution, but attention was strongly drawn to the latent possibilities of such movements, and the newspapers contained daily references to the subject, so that the excitement in the public mind was running high. In December of that year the United States steamer "Chesapeake" sailed from New York to Portland, Me., and, when several days out from land, rebel emissaries, who had shipped as passengers, assaulted the officers and crew, overpowered them, and seized the vessel, which was then headed for the Bay of Fundy. The cruise of these pirates was not continued, however, because some of the crew stole the cargo and decamped.

But a far bolder plot was being hatched in New York City, having for its immediate object the seizure of two large ocean steamers, when one or two days out, by rebel agents, who were to ship as passengers or crew. The scheme included also the shipment as freight of crates, packages and hogsheads, ostensibly containing merchandise, but which in reality contained guns, small arms, ammunition, etc., for the use of the pirates after they had overpowered the loyal crew and obtained control of the ship.

It will be readily seen that, at the time referred to—December, 1863—the seizure of two ocean steamers, and their conversion into privateers, would create dismay and consternation in the North, and would, perhaps, be followed by the capture of many small craft, merchant vessels and government transports, and possibly the destruction of some of our seaboard cities.

Meantime, the rebel government was actually having a large and varied issue of confederate bonds engraved and printed almost within sight of the old tombstone in Trinity churchyard, and communications on the subject of such bonds were passing to and fro between the rebel government in Richmond and its agents in New York City, the medium of these communications being the very same hieroglyphics which were carved on that old tombstone nearly one hundred years before.

These deep-laid plots were fortunately revealed to the federal authorities in time to prevent their fulfillment. The date set for the seizure of the two ocean steamers was Christmas, 1863, and only four days previous to that time the first of the two rebel ciphers was translated by the trio of War Department cipher-operators, and the assistant secretary of war, Mr. Charles A. Dana, started for New York at 7:30 P. M. the same day to confer with General Dix, and before the date set for the seizure of the ocean vessels the rebel plotters and agents had been spotted, a watch set upon their movements, and within a week they had all been arrested and millions of rebel bonds seized and destroyed, instead of being used in England and France to help pay for the rebel ships of war then being built in those countries.

The history of these two rebel ciphers is as follows:

They were each enclosed in an envelope addressed to Alexander Keith, Jr., Halifax, Nova Scotia, and were mailed from New York City, the first one being dated December 18, 1863, and the second one four days later.

United States Consul Jackson, at Halifax, had previously reported that Keith was in frequent communication with rebel blockade-runners and with rebel agents in the United States. The mails were therefore being closely watched, and when Abram Wakeman, postmaster, discovered the envelope bearing Keith's address, which was dropped in the New York postoffice on December 18, he promptly sent it to the secretary of war, who, on seeing that the inclosure was in cipher, turned it over to the War Department clerks, who vainly puzzled over the mysterious signs for two days. On the third day the important document was turned over to the telegraph department and placed in the hands of the trio, who set to work with a determination to do what the War Department clerks had failed in doing.

Horace White, now editor of the New York Evening Post, was a clerk in the War Department at that time, and may have tried to solve the puzzle.

In my boyhood days I was for a short period employed in the store of John Horne & Co., Pittsburg, and as one of their cost marks was based upon the thirteen prime characters taken from the two geometrical figures shown below, I was thus able to discern, perhaps, more readily than my associates, the slight differences between the several characters of that series.

The basis or foundation referred to is as follows: The Arabic numerals and the dollar and cent mark being shown in their respective places:

Two days after we had interpreted the first cipher dispatch, another one, dated December 22, and also placed in an envelope bearing Keith's address, was placed before us, and was quickly translated.

This communication proved to be of almost equal importance, referring, as it did, to the fact that Confederate notes and bonds were being engraved and printed in New York City.

The second cipher was prepared in the same way as the first, and its translation is as follows:

The following telegrams to the War Department, during the week following Mr. Dana's visit to General Dix, will show that no time was lost in hunting up the rebel gang and placing them under arrest:

New York, 1 P. M., December 29, 1863.

Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

I have this morning seen evidence which affords good ground for the belief that the United States * * * here is probably in full partnership with the rebel operators of this city. From long personal knowledge of the individual I have no doubt he is perfectly capable of such treasonable conduct.

C. A. DANA.

New York City, December 30, 1863.

Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

The man inside the bank note company reports that the work is not being done there. He says they are capable of it, and informs me they have a branch establishment at Montreal, and that there is no doubt but the work is being done there.

Send the proper person to Montreal and Rouse's Point. In my opinion the plates will come through to Albany and the Western Road to Boston, and by Cunard steamer to Halifax.

ROBERT MURRAY, U. S. Marshal.

New York, 5:30 P. M., December 31, 1863.

Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

I have arrested Hilton, and his partner and foreman, and secured the plates for the rebel bonds, also 5's, 10's, 20's and 50's Confederate notes.

I have arrested the lithographer and printer, and taken possession of Hilton's premises and the lithographer's, and placed a guard over them until the evening, and I have no doubt I shall get the machinery also.

ROBERT MURRAY, U. S. Marshal.

New York, January 1, 1864.

E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

I secured machinery and dies this morning at 2 A. M., together with several millions of dollars in bonds and notes of various denominations. I am after the maker of the machinery, and will get him. From an intercepted letter I learn that Cammack is in Havana.

ROBERT MURRAY, U. S. Marshal.

One result of our successful work in unravelling the rebel ciphers was personal in its character, but not the less interesting to the trio, for on Christmas day General Eckert, our chief, notified us that the secretary of war had authorized him to make a substantial increase in our salaries from December 1.

Alexander Keith, Jr., the man to whom the rebel cipher dispatches were enclosed, continued to act as rebel agent at Halifax until the close of the war, and then disappeared from public view, only to turn up in 1875 as Thomassen, who was blown up on the dock at Bremerhaven, Germany, by an infernal machine, which had been placed in a crate or box of merchandise for shipment to the United States. The supposition at the time was that he was engaged in the nefarious scheme of insuring packages of little value shipped on transatlantic steamers, and one of which at least on each steamer contained an infernal machine, set to operate in mid-ocean and sink the vessel and cargo,

OHIO SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

Thomassen then collecting his insurance. Not long before his tragic death several ocean vessels, including the "Boston," had sailed from port never to be heard from again.

My associate in the War Department, Mr. Charles A. Tinker was ordered to Halifax in the autumn of 1864 to watch Keith's doings, and from his observations it was generally concluded that Keith was capable of any crime in the calendar. Mr. Tinker has told me of his belief in the identity of Keith and Thomassen.
